Recording is only half the battle, to make it sound good, you have to edit it right.

In today's production environment, it is absolutely necessary to possess a diverse set of abilities. No matter how proficient one is in their primary skill, one cannot simply anticipate that it will be enough to get by in life. The key to successfully securing and completing projects lies in expanding your range of abilities to include fundamentals such as audio editing.

Recording and mixing are the two most important parts of the audio production process. Without properly recorded audio, the editing process becomes one of diminishing returns, and good audio editing is heavily dependent on the source material.
