Who's Your Daddy?

My son is a subscriber, and I get to read his copy of Digit and use his CD/ DVD. I have an XP machine, and your mag and CD/DVD are a great help. A couple of suggestions / requests :

1. At the top right-hand corner of every window, there are three little squares—clicking on these will minimize / maximize /close the window. Could you please give the Registry hack for increasing the width (not the height) of these squares ? (It's a little difficult to move the mouse there)

2. Frankly, I am not very comfortable in tackling the Registry—very afraid of it in fact. And you give any number of Registry hacks in every issue of Digit! Could you please include these as .reg files on the CD/DVD (a separate file for each hack)—this will help old fogies like me a great deal!

Via e-mail

Dear Sir,

You can change the size of the "Caption Buttons", but both width and height will change. Go to the desktop, right-click and select Properties. Click on the Appearance tab, then click the Advanced button. In the dropdown, select Caption buttons and then increase the size. Click OK and Apply to see the changes.

About .reg files on the CD/DVD, it's a dangerous proposition, because wrong registry values can require a format to fix. Every computer is different, with different hardware and software, so what is just a registry change for one could be a nightmare for another.

Even Teachers Dig It

Your sincere efforts in organising technical information is indeed commendable. When I first came in contact with this magazine, it was in my college library, and from that time, I have become a regular reader. I am a lecturer. This magazine really helps me a lot during my lectureship, helps me in organising seminars on various latest hardware and software technologies such as Bluetooth, Wi-Fi, USB ports, wireless tech, etc. It certainly complements our knowledge.

There are three requests I hope you'll consider.

- Please provide some networking and programming content, which is really needed in the present state of affairs.

- Provide Windows Vista OS in detail and its Window working environment with its distinct features in a Fast Track issue.

- Please give more consideration to new software applications, their features and usage; it proves to be commercially beneficial.

I know that you take into consideration your overall readership before considering my request, but then, I am also a part or a single drop of your entire ocean of readers.

Bhavana Gupta

Dear Bhavana,

Your first request has been echoed by many readers. We probably will be getting into programming content in the near future. As for your second request, expect a Fast Track to Windows Vista soon! And third, we have already begun giving more importance to new software and their features and usage—for example, this month, we have an article on Adobe Photoshop CS3.

Yes, you're just one drop, but many a drop makes the ocean... Thanks very much for writing in!

The New Interface

Hi Team Digit, you are doing a splendid job. You never disappoint the buyer; in course of time, your magazine has reached the top position. Hats off to the Digit CD/DVD interface—it's mind-blowing. With the customisations you've made, one can be in a separate Digit world!

The Fast Track gives very, very valuable info. And regarding the March issue, you have given freeware, which is very useful to many enthusiasts.

Murali Krishna

Dear Murali

We put a lot of hard work into the designing of the new interface, and we're so glad to get mail from people like you, appreciating it! Thanks for your feedback.

Must...Resist...

I have been in subscription for two years now, and let me tell you that Digit has really gotten better if not excellent in the due course.

Digit really delivers what readers want from it, but above all, the feeling of awe and adventure we get from waiting for the mag to come out each month is above all the joy we get from reading it.

Digit is as good as any international tech mag, but it needs to create its distinct ground and level of articles to stand out in the spotlight. Digit, as I know, is the only mag in India who sets its own standards, and that's what I want it to do at the international level.

However, you can extend the online presence by distributing a special e-copy over the Net for subscribers only. I think that can extend the magazine's ground to the international level. Also, you should publish articles in ratio of the readers based on the interest and knowledge they have; this point becomes clear by saying that a geek doesn't want know how we can effectively use a freeware, while a casual reader would love to know it! Apart from that, what I really miss is a live chart of latest hardware based on performance, performance per price, etc. on the Internet, since the chart you publish is based on your old reviews and does not reflect the present situation.

I would thank Digit for bringing out the Fast Track to blogging right when I started my own! I am able to generate 30 visits per day!

Aashit Verma

Dear Aashit

Your ideas are all well-thought-out, I must say. The idea of distributing e-copies on the Net for subscribers, however, is not really feasible, since one of the main reasons people enjoy Digit is that they can take it around on their commute, read it in bed, in the loo... wherever! I mean, this is not only about Digit, it's about any print publication.

We might be doing a nationwide survey of our readers to find out what exactly they want, but until then, what we publish is indeed the "average" of what people want.

Again, a live chart of the type you mentioned is not really possible as of now, for various reasons. We put considerable effort into our tests, and we cannot continually keep them updated.

In any case, keep the letters coming!
