

The Intex and Nokia phones have support for sending as well as receiving SMSes in Hindi. The MotoFONE F3 has a speaking tutor that can not only guide you through the phone setup, it can also help you achieve basic phone tasks. And this localised version of the phone has these voice instructions in Hindi and Punjabi too!

Performance Signal reception

Unlike in the other categories, we found that here, there were quite a few mobiles that were able to catch the signal as good as the Nokias. The Intex infi and the bleu 250X were the only exceptions.

Voice clarity

All the models had decent audibility from the earpiece except for the bleu 250X, which was sub-par. With the hands-free plugged in, the Intex King was the only phone which posed audibility problems for the listener at the other end. The speaker-phone clarity of the Nokia mobiles was exceptionally good.

Speed

The Nokias were the only ones with a sophisticated OS (Symbian Series 40). But these have a slower processor, and the OS seemed to overwhelm them—resulting in sluggish response to key-presses. The Intex infi was much faster; marginally behind it was the Motorola W220.

Motorola MotoFONE F3
A good first-time purchase can drain your wallet in a big way if used unwisely. If you do not need to download stuff, WAP is the way to go, because most mobile service providers offer it at just Rs 49 per month, while GPRS starts at Rs 199. Some service providers charge for data transfer at a rate of 10 paise per 10 KB. While this may seem insignificant, you should realise that you'd almost never realise how many pages you surf during an Internet session. You can reduce the amount of data transfer by disabling images and sounds in the Internet settings of your mobile phone. Better still, you can go with certain service providers who do not charge for downloads at all, though the Internet speeds will be slower. If you are a heavy Net user and need GPRS, it's better to go with a flat-rate, unlimited subscription.

Value-Added Services: Be careful when you subscribe to Value-Added Services such as Horoscope, Dating, Cricket Updates, Contests, etc. You might well end up not knowing how much you're paying.
