Turn off read receipts

Nowadays, almost all mainstream Instant messaging (IM) applications replicate one another in terms of what they offer. Over time, only emojis and stickers have blocks the read receipts any time you access Facebook or Messenger on Chrome. Alternatively, if you're using Adblock Plus (ABP) on your browser, go to its Options > Filter lists > Add this URL to your block list: `facebook.com/ajax/mercury/change_read_status.php$xmlhttprequest`. It works on all browsers that support the installation of ABP. To install it on Chrome, go to <https://goo.gl/J0l3S8> or to <https://goo.gl/KC0GhB> for Firefox.

Turn off notification alerts

Do you like to be notified every single time you receive a new message? Your answer may vary based on the frequency and amount of messages you receive every day. Limited notifications are always fun. Nevertheless, imagine waking up from a deep sleep to those chirpy sounds a few chat heads are making on your phone. Won't it be disturbing? Of course. Especially if a group of, say, ten members are typing in simultaneously in a group chat, and you have no choice but to participate.

Such notifications can be turned off from within the app's settings. Go to Settings > Apps > Messenger > Uncheck 'Show notifications'. Facebook Messenger for Android has an advanced setting allowing you to choose from between 15 minutes, 1 hour, 4 hours and 24 hours until those notifications resume. If you want to hide chat alerts from only an individual or a group, go to Messenger > Tap and hold the chat > Mute notifications > Choose how long you want to mute the chat for and iPhone users can choose between killing notifications for an hour or until 8 a.m. the next day. Similarly, if iPhone users want to mute notifications for any particular chat, you can swipe left on a conversation > Tap 'Mute' > Select for how long you want to mute the conversation and you're done!

apparently differed from service to service. The foundation layer's been the same. For example, Person A sends a message to Person B. Eventually, Person B will open the message but may not read it. Senders receive an acknowledgment in the form of "read receipts" informing them that you've seen their message even if you haven't read it. This brings the conversation to an abrupt halt or premature end, sometimes escalating into an issue in the real world. While killing read receipts on mobile apps is difficult, it's super simple to do on your desktop. You have a couple of alternatives to deactivate the "Seen" messages in case you want to do this on your desktop. If you're a Chrome user, there's this extension called 'Facebook Unseen' (<https://goo.gl/aFHed1>). It simply messages. However, it isn't as bad as we all had speculated earlier. Over time, Facebook Messenger has improved its overall service, fixed bugs and brought about many big-time changes to its offering. Additionally, keeping user's enthusiasm in mind, Facebook introduced new emojis, stickers and what not. But one thing which, according to us, has won billions of hearts is Messenger apps – Yes, the set of third-party applica-
