How we unwind

SKOAR! at IGX 2015

With the resurgence of gaming conventions in India, it was only natural that SKOAR! would be part of anything gaming! So we hauled our arses off to the convention centre and set up an impromptu LAN party for Quake III Arena. It was fun to mingle with the younger gamers and lay them to waste. PBS documentaries

Those who dwell at the Digit Test Lab aren't just interested in tech keynotes, we consume an awful lot of documentaries and this month it was PBS's Frontline which was on the frontline. From Bush's War to The Vaccine War, each documentary was wonderfully done and had most of us hooked all through our lunch breaks.

FRONTLINE

It's back and it's better

After a dismal season 17 and 18, South Park has finally come out with a much better season satirizing more relevant topics like Social Justice Warriors, online advertising, gentrification, police brutality, idiotic Yelpers, etc. while maintaining the theme of political correctness throughout the season.

diGit DIARY

Another year has gone by, people have come and people have gone. We've grown (not matured, there's still a long way to go before that happens) and we've groaned as yet another month of Zero1 has left us devoid of energy. But there's hope ... in a galaxy far far away. Star Wars episode VII is just around the corner and it's more than enough to get our hearts beating again!

As for those who've left (read: Raaabo) or have been ostracised (read: The Ant; we kid!) there hasn't been much news. The last we heard from them, The Ant was singing praises of those of the Anglo-Saxon ilk. And Raaabo is without Internet, yes, even first world countries have their share of problems, his being an overzealously rescheduling handyman. Hopefully, he'll reconnect with the mothership sooner than later.

Meanwhile, Maggi made a comeback and Mr. Dey was taken in by their marketing and he quickly ordered the largest carton that he could online. While this definitely has gained him quite a lot of hipster cred, it might not be too late for an intervention... or a sharp whack on his head maybe. Also, his Instagramming has reached new highs with a single post garnering over 150 new followers under 24 hours. Hipster cred +150.

One thing is for sure, Jayesh couldn't have hated this month more than any other. For starters, Anirudh and Mithun weren't around with the later only making guest appearances once in a blue moon like a puberty pimple, so he not only had his own workload but also had to manage theirs as well. Needless to say, he had to spend way too many nights at the office. And even at night, he couldn't get any respite as our Roomba would come to life exactly at four in the morning and scare the crap out of Big Daddy when he was at his lowest. As if that wasn't enough, something that Jayesh had been happily boasting about (unlimited OneDrive storage) got canned and he nearly caught the next flight to Amreeka to have a word with Mr. Nadella. But amongst all of these unfortunate misgivings as Jayesh slumped down in his dejected state, a ray of sunshine gleamed forth from the clouds of misery. He finally ditched his clunky geriatric AIO and commandeered Anirudh's old rig. Finally, he'll be able to dust off his Steam library and start playing some proper PC games... for a month.

Team Digit now has a new member as Nikhil has finally decided to ditch his students and join up full-time. Little did he know that we were holding back till now and are yet to unleash our fury unto him. Huehuehue!

In other news, we've managed to snag an "economically priced" coffee machine. As if it wasn't enough for the trolls of the Test Centre to be pumped up on sugary sodas coupled with Jayesh's incessantly running song loops, we'll now be snorting all the caffeine that we can get our hands on. Who knows, we might even start experimenting and come up with something better than Red Bull. See ya next year! ☑
