

Jaybird Freedom Headphones

The Jaybird Freedom Headphones made some much needed improvements to their previous sports headphone, the X2. In addition to improved sound quality, noise cancellation, and an overall better and more comfy fit, the Jaybird Freedom's biggest draw is its new design. The buds have been trimmed down considerably. Instead of the usual bulge of the earbuds, the earpieces now curve downward and sit against the lower part of your earlobe. What this means is you can now wear helmets and other headwear that would normally cover your ears while using these headphones. Most of the techy electronic stuff has been moved to a remote that hangs a little below the right earpiece.

It's larger and heavier than its predecessor, the X2's remote, but it's hardly noticeable. The Freedom Headphones are sweatproof, as should be expected of sports headphones. The Jaybird Freedom comes with Bluetooth 4.0, which can be paired with upto 8 devices. The headphones also allow for making phones calls with its in-built microphone.

The Jaybird Freedom is currently priced at $200 (~13,500 approx), which may seem a tad pricey but they're worth every penny if you're looking for a good wireless, sports headphone.
