

1 BroApp

You can't go wrong with an app that calls itself "Your clever relationship wingman". The app sends out automated text messages to your girlfriend or significant other on a set schedule, freeing up time for your manly pursuits, like playing football with your bros, getting a beer with your bros or even going shopping with your bros (it's totally cool, bro). You can enter a list of custom messages and a time, and the app will send out a random message from the list around the set time. It sends out the message at a slightly different time every day, lest she get suspicious, and you can even disable the messages when you're connected to your girlfriend's WiFi network to avoid awkward situations. The devs claim that users have responded with a "99% Bro satisfaction rating and a 3 fold increase in Bro happiness", even resulting in one marriage proposal, so you know it's legit, bro.

iOS: <http://dgit.in/BroAppiOS>

Android: <http://dgit.in/BroAppAndroid>

3 Li.st

Remember B.J. Novak? He played the inimitable Ryan Howard on The Office while also being a writer and an executive producer on the show. B.J. Novak loves lists, so he brought out an app that's built around lists. Now, before you go all "Not another list app" on us, Li.st is not a to-do list, neither is it an app to help you remember things. Think of the app as an Instagram for lists. Users can create lists about practically anything that interests them, and can follow their friends, celebrities or companies to see what they're listing. These lists can include text, pictures and location data, with celebrities like Mindy Kaling posting some hilarious ones like "Things I Love About Broad City", "A Few Great Beards" and "Actors That Will Make Me More Likely To See A Movie". Of course, you can also use the app to get expert recommendations for books, movies, restaurants etc. by following accounts such as The New Yorker, Slate magazine or Cracked.com.

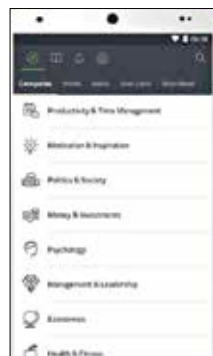

iOS: <http://dgit.in/ListiOS>

Android: <http://dgit.in/ListAndroid>

2 Blinkist

We like to think that we're well read, with the ability to have intelligent and engaging discussions on economics, philosophy, science and technology. Our non-fiction reading lists are growing longer every day, just as our attention spans are dwindling - which makes one wonder, just how much longer can we keep up the charade? That's where Blinkist comes in. By distilling the essence of over 1000 popular works of non-fiction into 15 minute-long snippets, the app is a lifesaver for those of us without the time or discipline to sit through an entire book. The curated selection includes an eclectic mix of best-sellers and lesser-known titles, spanning neuroscience, cognitive economics, startups and technology, politics, and self-help. You also have the option to listen to an audiobook version of the snippet, and the app has an offline mode so you can read without an active internet connection. Interesting passages can be highlighted, and you can take notes and export them to Evernote. Plus, if you prefer doing your reading on the Kindle, you can have your daily 'blinks' delivered directly to your device or the Kindle smartphone app.

iOS: <http://dgit.in/BlinkistiOS>

Android: <http://dgit.in/BlinkistAndroid>

15

LITTLE-KNOWN APPS EVERY PHONE SHOULD HAVE

A SMARTPHONE IS ONLY AS SMART AS ITS APPS. LET'S TAKE A LOOK AT SOME LESSER-KNOWN APPS YOU OUGHT TO BE USING.

BY PAANINI NAVILEKAR
feedback@digit.in