

7 Spoilt for options

This is the era of choice. With the reach we have thanks to technology, there's no limit to the number of choices one has when it comes to, well, literally anything. Online shopping has taken over the world by storm and we can buy absolutely anything online. There's options for everything, from food to order, clothes to buy, people to go out with *cough*Tinder*cough*. There's a bazillion brands to choose from now and everything is right at our fingertips. Yep, definitely spoilt rotten.

8 Online Stalking

If you're someone from the 80s, you'd be shocked at the amount of the information you could get about someone and get away with it. Online stalking has become quite a common term. Infact we use the word quite laxly these days. It's scary how much information one can get, from your social media.

9 You need passwords for everything

You need a password for everything, today.

Passwords are primarily a safety measure. Being able to log into anything with Facebook or Google is a good and bad thing.

You can log into either one, and all your accounts which are linked to that account are open for you. Although, if you forget one, you lose access to all accounts linked to that account.

10 Spoilers

People who share spoilers are the scum of the internet. We all love watching our favourite serials. We enjoy the excitement and anticipation that comes with waiting for the next episode. Then we decide to take a break and maybe chill on a social networking site for a while, and someone or the other has to ruin the entire experience for us by giving us their "opinion" on the latest episode. We don't want it.

11 A Lazy generation

Let's face it people, technology is making us lazy. It won't be long till we're all fat people on automated chairs like the kind we see in Wall-E. Everything is at our fingertips, everything comes right to our doors. We don't have any reason to leave our houses anymore. We can talk from home, eat at home, buy stuff from home, order groceries from home. You see what we're getting at. Start going outdoors! Live a little!

12 We're getting dumber

Why learn anything when you can just Google it? We know that we can look up whatever we need online and therefore we don't bother learning new stuff anymore. Even for simple things like word meanings and calculations we rely on technology. In most cases, we don't seem to realise or even bother if the information is true or false and continue with our lives believing that what we just read is the absolute truth.

13 We're turning into insufferable know-it-alls

On the flip-side of things, technology has made it possible for us to have access to an abundance of informations. So someone who frequently has access to portals of information is very likely to pick up on lots of new information, in the form of tiny tid-bits of information or maybe the person was just curious and watched a documentary or something. Anyway, the kind of people who like to keep pointing out your mistakes and correcting you, those are the insufferable ones. These are the kind of people who can never be wrong. Get into an argument with them at your own risk.

14 FOMO

FOMO stands for the Fear Of Missing Out. We need to be constantly connected. We need to know what's happening at all times. We NEED to know what this person was doing that time. We can't miss out on anything. Because if we do, it'll be the end of the world as we know it. Hey wait, it actually won't. In fact, I don't think anything bad will come out of missing on a few things. Huh. Guess I was anxious for nothing.

15 Disconnecting from tech is now considered weird

Say you're a nature lover and want to go on a camping trip, disconnected from the world. If someone doesn't know about this and tries to connect with you, well they're pretty much going to assume you died or something, if you don't respond. It's come to the point where if you don't have some kind of tech, you're weird. The simple things in life like sitting on a park bench are considered absurd.
