Sure, 9GAG provides you with your daily dose of lulz, and you also get to feel superior to those who get their meme fix through Facebook or (gasp!) WhatsApp. But if you truly want to up your meme-cred, your quest will take you to the birthplace of all that is k3wl on the Internet, 4Chan. The simple image-based bulletin board allows you to share and discuss images on a range of topics, including Japanese culture, Technology, DIY (Do It Yourself) or Television. Scratch the surface though, and you'll unlock a deep (and sometimes dark) corner of the internet that revels in its anonymity and ephemerality – posters aren't required to create an account, and threads aren't saved, so discussions can disappear off the internet in a matter of hours. The site has given birth to the infamous 'troll face', our modern, image-macro, version of internet memes, and even the phrase 'Epic Fail'. Fair warning though, there are parts of the site that are home to explicit content and abusive behaviour, so you might not want to be caught surfing it at work.

12 Reddit (www.reddit.com)

A website that calls itself the "Front Page Of The Internet" and boasts over 200 million unique visitors every month isn't exactly unheard of, but its true beauty lies in some of its lesser-known, esoteric subreddits that offer a mixture of information, humour, shock or just mild bemusement. PhotoshopBattles (<https://www.reddit.com/r/photoshopbattles>) is one where users are invited to use their image-editing skills on photographs to create hilarious results. HistoryPorn (<https://www.reddit.com/r/HistoryPorn>) and ColorizedHistory (<https://www.reddit.com/r/ColorizedHistory>) are great for anyone with even a casual interest in history, and frequently throws up some rare and amusing photographs. WhoWouldWin (<https://www.reddit.com/r/whowouldwin/>) is our go-to site to settle questions like who's stronger – Batman or Superman, or who would win a wizarding duel – Albus Dumbledore or Gandalf? The subreddit even conducts an annual Game of Thrones tournament with users voting on the outcome of a 64 character-strong fight to the finish!

13 Draw a Stick Man (<http://www.drawastickman.com>)

This is a fun little adventure game where you draw your character (A stick man), arm him with weapons of your choice and guide him through an epic journey, battling dragons and saving cats stuck in trees. You can get really creative with your character, drawing him as a six-legged monster (a-la Kafka's Gregor Samsa), add a pair of wings (a-la Icarus), or just draw him as a humanoid robot.

The best drawings get featured in their gallery, with the game being featured on Google Play as well as on Xbox One.

14 HP Companion (<https://hpcompanion.com>)

The Harry Potter series of books are among the widest selling books of all time, and you're right – the movie didn't do justice to the books at all. You could wait around for some years before the movies are remade, or you could hop on to the HP Companion site, which has some delightful watercolour illustrations for every chapter of each of the seven books. Whether its hilarious stuff like watching Aunt Marge bloat up like a balloon or the heartbreak involved when a certain character(s) dies, the illustrations will delight every Harry Potter fan.

Also on the site are some character portraits and detailed essays discussing each of the seven books, which should keep you busy until the rumoured sequel to the series is released (You didn't hear it from us!)

15 Sporcle (<http://www.sporcle.com>)

The best way to kill time is to challenge yourself to some engaging (but ultimately pointless) trivia. Before BuzzFeed and QuizUp, there was Sporcle – a home to hundreds of thousand of user-submitted quizzes and trivia games covering every topic you can conceive of. From knowing your capitals to keeping up with celebrity gossip, quoting lines from your favourite TV show to indulging in mind-numbing word games, this site has it all.

With a slogan that goes "Mentally Stimulating Diversions", the site makes no attempt to conceal its true intentions, and is extremely popular with college students who claim it helps them study (Yeah, right).
