Pokémon Go

In case you are not aware of the concept, Pokémon Go creates an augmented reality for the player which is everything the millions of fans of Pokémon could have hoped for. There are Pokémon to be discovered everywhere you go, and Poke Stops and gyms are located in places of cultural significance and other important spots. The basic gameplay of the game is nothing new. Ingress which was produced by the same developers, Niantic, has been around since 2013.

There are a few issues with the game, though. It drains your battery pretty fast and while it may be fun to walk in the beginning, only diehard fans will stay the course after some time. The best thing about Pokémon Go is that for the first time, a game is truly social. You really can meet up with other players and make friends while looking for Pokémon. The game makes you look up once in a while and appreciate the beauty around you. Just be careful to also stay alive while playing. And in the words of the immortal childhood hero, you "Gotta catch'em all!"

Tracky Train

Someone once told a young train that he should make his own path in life. Taking this advice rather literally, he decided to go where his heart wanted to, never mind where the tracks lay. In Tracky Train, it is your job to lay out a path for this headstrong train. The game starts in a quant, pixelated little countryside. Passengers are scattered at random across the map as are the coins. The gamescape is dense with sundry objects. There are roads, bridges and hot-air balloons. There are flowers, houses and tunnels built in to cliffs. These serve the purpose of adding richness to the gameplay as well as visual quality of the game.

There are 101 types of characters that you can pick up and drop along the way. Some are pretty ordinary, like Jeff, others, like the Plumber can't help but remind you of more well known characters (the Plumber is a bluish Mario). When your train is filled with passengers you are supposed to drop them off at stations that appear at regular intervals. In conclusion, Tracky Train deserves a play because of its unique concept, polished execution.

Storm the Train

What is better than blasting zombies to damnation? Blasting zombies to damnation on a moving train, Bollywood style. Storm the Train is a beautiful game where the only constant is that you are on a moving train. The first level is a Victorian era train overrun with zombies while the next one is a 'Future train' crammed with robots. The controls are located on both sides of the phone and are quite precise, with two movement buttons on the left and two buttons to jump and shoot on the right.

The game has a cartoony feel with intricately designed characters and trains. There is a good collection of heroes with different abilities that can be upgraded with cash collected in the game.

There is also a daily special challenge that you have to attempt with a given agent. These are a little more difficult but also more rewarding. Storm the Train is the closest thing we have to Broforce on a mobile device. It's totally worth the time if you like zombies, robots, trains, guns or well made games. Check it out!
