in online interactions. The English language has never really recovered from the damage and these words have been included in the Oxford dictionary, worthy of etymological chronicling.

If you have all of them engraved into your vocabulary and use them quite naturally, hey there, millennial!

You have more virtual 'friends' than real ones

Frankly, most millennials are too young to remember the emergence of Orkut, but some of them might remember using it. Facebook, although, is a completely different story with wide adoption in millennials as well as non-millennials. But there is one thing that probably differentiates the two groups on social media, and that is the importance of having online friends.

If an unfriending on Facebook really makes you lose a friend, if you're actually bothered about a friend not hitting the "Like" button on your latest profile picture, and you actually consider yourself a social person because you have 5000 friends online, it doesn't really matter how old you are – you are a millennial at heart.

While we are not against this, we would advise you to have friends offline as well. Last time we checked, they are quite fun to have around as well!

No trip/outing/restaurant visit is complete without a check-in Gone are the days when a perfect trip involved actually enjoying the experience of travelling. If you haven't checked in to at least the airport, the hotel as well as all the significant tourist spots that you have seen, it's almost like the trip never happened.

Although check-in's are a thing primarily rampant on Facebook, there are dedicated apps that also share your trips, be it a vacation in another country or a visit to your favorite restaurant, for the world to see. In fact, this has even led to some criminals taking advantage of this readily available information due to ignored security settings on social networks.

Check-in's are cool. But do you really want to tell the world that you just went to the supermarket? Trust me, nobody really wants to know. Unless you're a millennial.

You have more selfies than the number of photos in your entire family album

Although millennials are quite prolific in their achievements and innovations, to say that they invented the selfie wouldn't be entirely accurate. Small cameras and cameras with timers were occasionally used to take self portraits, albeit with a high degree of uncertainty and sometimes at the cost of expensive photographic film.

But with the advent of high resolution front cameras on smartphones, selfies soon became a craze and before we knew it, teenagers were snapping self-shots for a new haircut, a new pimple or even nothing in particular! Gone were the days when you had to be social for your photograph to be taken. The popularity of apps like Snapchat and Instagram are no less significant for the immense number of selfies being taken, or perhaps it is the other way round?

If you adhere to the Order of the Selfie and it's sub-divisions of duck-face, bathroom selfie, gym selfie, no-makeup no filter ...phew!.. You guessed it, you're a millennial!

You think EDM is the personification of musical greatness

No hard feelings here! Before I say anything else, let me make it clear that not all EDM is bad and we actually follow some good artists in this genre. That being said, if you really think that the current popularity of EDM music and the kind of music that is being randomly made out there is actually the best thing that has happened to music – newflash! You're most likely a millennial. Today, practically anyone can pick up a digital audio workstation and free samples off the internet, and then bang those two together as hard as they can until it's a full length track. Hence, it is no surprise that the quality of electronic music has degraded to a point where some tracks can actually be used in third-degree torture. If you are one of the few who actually put in effort to salvage good music from the pile out there, hats off to you!

The only serious bugs and viruses you know are health related

The closest thing to apocalypse that we non-millennials have known in our lifetime was probably the Y2K bug. Short for Year 2000, this was widely acclaimed to be the end of computer operated systems as we know it due to the MMDDYY date format reading 2000 as 1900. Although that changed once the new millennium hit, most of us remember the excitement and drama of it all. Not to forget the surge of viruses in email attachments that sent themselves to everybody on your mailing list.

The strength of anti-viruses as well as server level security has increased a lot during the recent years. Hence it is not a surprise that there is a large group of gadget savvy people who only know viruses and bugs of the ebola type. That is definitely not a bad thing, but they did miss out on a lot of adventure in terms of infected computers. Now that we think of it, it is probably a good thing.

Limited number of shots on a camera is incomprehensible

Photographs have been a cultural phenomenon ever since the first camera was invented. There was a time when film photography was the only kind available, and photography was a novelty due to the limited number of shots available and high cost of the film. Only special occasions and perfectly prepared scenes warranted a shot.

All that changed with the advent of digital cameras. Photos were now so easy to take, review and delete within min-
