

Beoplay H5

We are moving away from wired earphones to wireless ones, and it's reassuring that manufacturers are identifying this shift to deliver good quality ones. Because improving wireless earphones/headphones is a way better solution than creating tangle-free ones. The H5 is a wireless pair of earphones directed towards both workout and regular use-cases. Coming from B&O, you can expect good looking aesthetics with sleeved cables driving their signature sound. They've also included a neat little trick to prevent you from losing the H5 by including a magnet behind the earpieces to snap it around your neck. Once clipped together, it powers down and shifts into a power saving mode. The sleeved cables are made from a high quality braided textile that runs right inside the earpiece moulds. This prevents any form of dust or sweat from entering, while the textured rubber and polymer material of the earpieces are resistant to sweat and moisture. The shape of ear canals differ drastically from person to person, but the company has apparently tried to keep a universal design to offer a snug fit for everyone. It connects to your devices using Bluetooth and the company has designed presets or profiles according to various activities such as working out, commuting to work, etc. The Beoplay App lets you fiddle around with the sound settings and also gives you the battery status of the earphones. The H5 clip to a cubic charger using magnets and gives you about five hours of playback. They are priced at €249, or approx ₹18,000
