

years for that matter. The entire Egyptian faction was based off of ancient pharaonic Egypt. What we mean by that is they used the older, iconic, and more commonly used depiction of Ancient Egypt for the Egyptian faction. However, Egypt no longer looked anything like that after the new kingdom was established in around 1000 BC – post Alexander the Great. And considering that the Total War: Rome campaign takes place between 270 BC and 14 AD, that's a millennium right there. So why would the game devs do something like that? Quite simple really, they thought it would be more fun this way. Did the bulk of players care? Ehh, probably not. Did we still learn a thing or two about history in the process? Most definitely.

Medal of Honor

The Medal of Honor games are one of the many shooter games that are based around World War II. Now the Medal of Honor games aren't exactly what one would call historically accurate games.

The title we'll be talking about is Medal of Honor: Underground, where you assume the role of Manon Batiste, a French Resistance fighter. Now in the game she gets recruited by the US Office of Strategic Services, or the OSS in short, as a commando. The OSS is the predecessor of the Central Intelligence Agency – or the CIA – by the way. Another tidbit of info we gained thanks to a game. Sweet! Anyway, it's very possible that Manon Batiste is based off of a real person – Helene Deschamps Adams. She was an actual French resistance fighter who was recruited by the OSS and during her time as a secret agent she saved many Jewish and American lives. However, we highly doubt that she gunned down several dozen Nazi troops during her stint as a secret agent. But you never know, it could have happened. Maybe.

Anyway, in one of the missions in this game, Manon infiltrates Wewelsburg Castle. Wewelsburg also happens to be SS headquarters. The SS – or Schutzstaffel – was called the "protection squadron" and was a small paramilitary force under Hitler. However, during his rise to power it became one of the strongest forces in Germany. What we're trying to get at is a single woman infiltrating the base of operations of one of the most powerful forces in Nazi Germany is preposterous. But wait there's more! While in the castle you face off against SS troops fully clad in "bullet-resistant" medieval armour who come at you with swords. Yes, swords. During World War II.

Let's analyse why this is silly. First off, a sword can't compete with a sub-machine gun, there's absolutely no hope for the guy with the sword.

There's no way he's going to be able to do something superhuman like deflect the bullets or cut them before they hit him. Second, there's a reason nobody wears medieval armour into combat anymore. Bullets would rip right through them, and it might actually cause more damage than if you weren't wearing any armor at all.

Prince of Persia

The Prince of Persia games have been

AGE of
EMPIRES

Historical accuracy isn't always a must: Games like Assassin's Creed and Total War Rome take creative liberties in the portrayal of historical facts just to make the games more fun. No one wants to feel like they're sitting in history class while gaming now, do they?

