Aura One

If you love big screens and reading, Kobo has launched the 7.8-inch Aura One with a resolution of 300dpi. We say big screen since it's unusual for an e-book reader to have such a huge screen, and as we know Kobo, they have kept their latest e-reader waterproof just like the previous one. At $229 it comparatively seems a little expensive, but hey, it's worth it if you can read your favorite books in the bathtub, isn't it?

Omen X

HP's latest in gaming desktops

Remember the time when the first line of Alienware gaming desktops and laptops were released? We sure do, especially that calm and straight-faced "no" we got from our parents because of the astronomical prices. It surely set a design trend years ago in other product categories along with gaming. HP reentered the gaming line with the Omen series through laptops and desktops, and their latest is the Omen X desktop. In the shape of a box straight out of a sci-fi movie, it's actually an innovative design to compartmentalise the various components. The chassis design is insane, supporting standard micro-ATX motherboards and open to future upgrades of all the components. The storage bays are completely tool-less, and one really convenient feature is not worrying about cable management. The form factor does look like it might melt down the components inside, but the tri-chamber design along with their separate cooling setup should keep things under control. The Omen X is part of their high-end gaming line so it does support VR and 4k gaming, otherwise why would anyone even call a gaming desktop high-end, right? Surprisingly, they haven't talked about RGB lighting and have only mentioned about nine lighting zones around the chassis. Although the base version includes the AMD Radeon RX 480 GPU inside, you'll be able to customise it with dual-GPU configurations from both team red and team green.
