

Traffic Lanes 2

Traffic Lanes 2 is perhaps the prettiest traffic simulator ever made for the mobile device. The aim of the game is fairly simple, to guide cars on an intersection safely on to their desired road. However, the execution is so detailed that you will feel you actually have a miniature traffic situation in the palm of your hand. The top-down view and tiny cars on intricate roads provide a lot of realism to the looks of the game. The menu design is crisp and complements the game very well. The soundtrack is faintly jazzy and binds all the different elements to create a wholesome gaming experience.

Another reason for the realism is that the developers have used data from actual geological surveys and aerial surveys from a variety of sources as the basis for creating the levels. You can zoom up very close into each map and observe your tiny cars and people proceed peacefully on their way (or in case they don't, watch them crash and burn). There are 5 stages set in areas like the suburban, the town, rush hour and New Zealand, each with 12 levels which can be played in the 'reach goal', arcade or the unlimited mode.

There are also no restrictions on completing a level before you proceed to the next and thus you can even tackle the hardest ones at the very beginning, depending on how well you play. Traffic Lanes 2 is completely free and even if traffic/airport simulators aren't something you have tried out in the past, you might just enjoy this game a lot.

There you go

There you go is a minimalist game about escape. Most other escape-the-room games have an eerie feel where the setting ranges from an abandoned mental asylum or a deserted office. However, this one has a cheery feel. Although still desolate, the isometric design in bright colours does make this noteworthy amongst a flood of 'Room' like escape games. The puzzles are fairly easy and include simple activities like flicking on a light switch as well as more challenging ones where you are supposed to crack a code.

Instead of being inside the room, you're given a point of view outside it. This means the room is just a little puzzle box in the middle of the screen. You can also rotate each room to have a glance at the other walls and often you will find clues there. Each level comes with a new twist and there are even easter eggs strewn across the game. In one level, over watering a plant leads to it growing through the roof (a la Jack and the Beanstalk) and into the next room. These refer to older games and who knows, they might even make you nostalgic for the games you played in your youth. Each room is also connected directly to the next one via a door and you can even follow the trail of doors right to the very first one from any point in the game.

One problem with this game is how short it is. However, it is sufficiently fun even in that short duration. You can take heart in the fact that the developer intends on making more levels depending on how positive the response to the game is. There you go is one escape game that deserves a try even if escape games aren't usually your favourite kind.

Nautical Life

If you ever fancied yourself as someone who is at home on the high seas and the smell of the ocean ignites your heart with a sense of adventure, well, get out there on your ship and conquer the world. If, however, you do not want to put that much effort into becoming a sailor (that you are sitting here reading game reviews is a slight indicator) get Nautical Life on your phone. Try out a life as a sea captain before you commit fully.

Nautical Life is about creating your dream yacht which you fund by fishing. There is a huge range of furniture and you can stock the many floors of your yacht with aquariums, beds, refrigerators and even a jacuzzi. If you envied Leonardo DiCaprio's yacht in the 'Wolf of Wall Street', here's your chance to have a virtual one right now. There are 28 species of fish spread around locations all over the world. Fishing is a mini-game where you click at the opportune moment when the difference between two flashing numbers is the maximum, which, in turn, becomes your strength against the fish and once you overpower it, it is yours to mount on the wall of your yacht.

The game inbuilt day and night cycle lets you watch the scenery and types of fish change according to the time of day. The design of the game is cutesy and the blocky ship traverses the gridded map of the world. The game values perseverance over skill. Play Nautical Life for a strictly casual RPG experience, out there on the seas.
