

Spelunky moves around like-a Mario but he wields-a whip like-a the guy in Castlevania. What makes Spelunky stand out is the fact that no two playthroughs are the same. That means you have a rogue-like platformer with unlimited replayability. Every level is unpredictable and there's a lot of treasure to be found, but if you're not prepared to take on that giant spider or move out of the way of that large boulder coming at you maybe this game isn't for you.

Gone Home

Gone Home is a game that gives us something many AAA titles are missing today. A captivating story. It's been awhile since we saw a game that left its mark on us long after we finished playing it. Imagine coming home after a long trip, an exhausting journey, all you need now is to see the faces of your loved ones and relax. But after you come home you find that there's no one there to greet you, the house is empty. You're left to explore your empty house and look for clues to find your missing family. You're hunting for clues, items, anything at all, anything that will lead you to your missing family. You're reading every note you find, and using keys all over the huge house. You're looking through everything, leaving nothing unturned, even the pizza boxes are not safe. It's not just some other point and click mystery game, you're gripped by the story from beginning to end, and you want to keep going, you want to piece everything together and unravel the story behind your missing family. And you won't be satisfied until you do, and when you do actually come to the conclusion yourself, it's a feeling that's beyond describing. You'll know what we mean if you play it yourself.

Hotline Miami

Hotline Miami is a top-down, beat-em-up, shoot-em-in-the-face, create-a-bloody-mess-while-you-do-so game with an overabundance of neon. There's a lot of neon! But it just adds to the retro vibe that just increases the appeal of the game. It's one of those games you're better off playing yourself than having us explain to you how bloody good it is. You've got a guy in an animal-mask wreaking havoc with whatever means at his disposal, and he's got quite a few means at his disposal. To add to that we've got a sweet 80s soundtrack to enhance the mayhem and a crazy story to go with it.

You'll immediately notice how it's reminiscent of the original GTA. Hotline Miami takes the top-down formula and pretty much perfects it. Indulge in some crazy clutch close-quarters combat as you murder your way through buildings full of bad guys, annihilating all of them with a variety of melee and ranged weapons. Don't worry about dying, you'll be doing a lot of that, it just takes one button to get right back to the action. Just wait till you can't stop getting back into this game!

Limbo

Limbo is simple. It's minimalistic. It uses only the simplest of controls. And it's a prime example of how you can make a masterpiece with limited resources. One look at this game is enough to compel you to try it out. It has a dark and mysterious vibe set in a gloomy monochromatic forest. You awaken in a forest and all you have to do, all you want to do, is look for your sister and escape the woods.

The developers of this game aptly call it a 'trial and death' game, because you'll be dying a lot. Very gruesomely. But hey that's how you learn. Also there's a giant spider that relentlessly follows you. It's quite terrifying. You should most definitely try this game out when you have a chance.

Bastion

As soon as you start Bastion, it's already being narrated. Even though it has gameplay like most other hack n slash indie games out there, something about Bastion screams unique.

Maybe it's the beautiful art and aesthetic, the game's a visual treat. Or maybe it's the amazing soundtrack, which in our books could possibly be
