

Google Trips launched

To help you plan your vacation and other trips, Google has launched Google Trips. <http://dgit.in/GglTrps>

Nikon KeyMission

Nikon launches KeyMission series, wearable cams, GoPro clones 360° cams. <http://dgit.in/NknKeyMsn> isn't true. If anything, it's worse than a phone taped to your face.

Jokes apart, it really will be an ingenious way to achieve different facial contortions with relative ease.

03 Pokémon Go: A.K.A how Nintendo tried to solve the obesity problem (This is possibly the only member of this vaunted list that is a brilliant product in its own right). Sometimes, the jokes write themselves. Other times, they're fuelled by the collective nerd-power of the entire universe. Nigh on a few days after its limited release, a pirated version of this game could be found on the phone of any 16 year old with access to Internet. Pokémon Go forces the player to do something the current generation of teens aren't very familiar with – walk.

The game took the world by storm, notching over 100 million downloads in under a month. Niantic – the company responsible for this game changer originally released a beta version with a reduced server capability. So, obviously, users kept getting disconnected.

The fact remains that Pokémon united people of different generations in a common task – catch 'em all.

It was like a shot of nostalgia in the arm for generations of Pokémon fans. While it did become a butt of a lot of jokes, this application might've just made the world a slightly better place.

04 Apple Pencil: All you have to do if you want to go viral on a social networking website is mock Apple. They've established themselves as both the frontrunners in the smartphone and laptop market, as well as the "we-make-zany-products-so-make-fun-of-us" market. The number of absurd products they release every few years has grown to such a number, that this list could legitimately just have Apple products on it.

For every Macbook Pro, they have something like the Apple Mouse. Who doesn't remember the inverted mouse charging jokes?

Even the Apple Mouse however, doesn't hold a candle to a certain Pencil. The Apple Pencil is a traditional stylus that only works with the iPad Pro. "Can we use it with the newest iPhone?", you ask. No, no, and a third time, no.

The iPad Pro itself uses the high sample rate only when it senses the stylus being used, and iPhones aren't equipped with such technology.

"So, what's the point?"

The founder of Apple, Mr. Steve Jobs, has already answered this. In 2007, when the original iPhone was released, he said, "Who needs a stylus?". Turns out, the Apple iPad Pro does. Don't believe it? Perhaps a 'back to basics' approach was what inspired the Apple Pencil. Which brings us to Apple Pencil's partner in crime, the all-new iPad Pro.

05 Apple iPad Pro: Over the years, Apple has gained itself quite a fan following. Sometimes it seems that they can take liberties other brands can't because of such brand loyalty.

One such liberty they seem to have taken is called Apple iPad Pro. When it was announced in 2015, Apple were just exiting their own unofficial "less is more" strategy, and seemed to have decided that everything needed to be bigger.

The Microsoft Surface Pro tablet had an attachable keyboard before the iPad Pro, which has led to a back-and-forth exchange of jibes. If the trend continues, expect Apple to 'reinvent' storage as well.

06 Facebook Reactions: Since Facebook became popular; there has been a fairly common complaint about the lack of a 'dislike' button. Taking heed of this, Facebook released an all new list of reactions in 2016. They were a group of emojis that could be used to 'react' to any status update. But you know what was missing? A DISLIKE BUTTON. Sigh.

There were users who had a sense of Stockholm Syndrome because the 'like' button had been their only means of expression up until now.

Others let out a sigh of relief. Why? No need to tax themselves by using, you know, words. Not that words themselves make a lot of sense on social networks!

While these Reactions are widely being used nowadays, we are still doubtful if people actually take the time to choose the appropriate one, or just hit the like button anyway! Much ado about nothing, indeed.