07 Airbnb: They redesigned their logo in 2014. There was no need, considering their net worth at that time was upward of $10 billion, and they were reaching new heights everyday. Before we get into the nitty gritty of their logo, let's see what they had to say about their new logo.

It was basically a combination of these four images, focused on the idea of 'belonging' (This is screen grab from their video)

Look at it from whatever angle you want, and you'll come to the conclusion that it rather looks like a part of the male genitalia. And once you see it, you can't un-see it. Something that the jokers of the Internet found out almost immediately.

Someone tell the people at Airbnb that there is a difference between good intentions and good design, and that one doesn't necessarily lead to the other. Though something tells me that they've already realized this.

08 TayTweets: Perhaps not as well known as the rest of the faux pas in this list, Microsoft's pet machine learning project. TayTweets was basically a bot Twitter account that was designed for human engagement. It was released with a lot of expectation, and you know how that goes, right?

Within 24 hours of its inception, the Twitter account had turned into a Hitler loving sex-bot. Here's a rough graph of its transformation.

While obviously a joke, this raises serious questions for the future of AI. In Microsoft's defense, they didn't program Tay to be such a monster. They just made her record, report, and understand what was tweeted to her, and tweet back in a way that was appropriate. It wasn't their fault that the Internet is full of racist, bigoted, sexist pigs. Though this doesn't mean it can't be joked about.

Microsoft took down the bot in short time, but the damage was already done. As the world accelerates its search for more 'human' AI, be prepared to be a witness to many such bot related mishaps.

09 Snapdeal: Apparently Snapdeal executives travelled from tip to toe of India to truly understand the relevance of the brand. They then spent a whopping Rs. 200 crore to come up with a new logo. Well that's understandable considering how well rebranding works if it is done well. And, when it comes down to it, their new logo isn't all that bad.

There's just one tiny problem - there might be a slight case of plagiarism.

There is an adage that T.S.Elliot has said to have come up with originally - that "good artists copy, great artists steal". It is left to your discretion to choose whether the people behind the new Snapdeal logo are good artists, or great artists.

10 Apple iPhone 7: To end this list, we go back to the original butt of all jokes. Yes, of course it is Apple. What list would be complete without the brand new Apple iPhone 7. This is a story that has been told every time there is an Apple release, so it can literally be told through just tweets and memes.

Oh, and by the way, the iPhone 7 has 2 cameras on the front now. Why? God knows.

Use your brains

Well, so that's that. There are, of course, hundreds of others highly amusing brand redesigns, faux pas, and just simple design mistakes. There are, however, the ones we found the most amusing. To actually feature all the hilarious brand mistakes here would make this an endless list. While they are funny, none of us would want that, right?

There seems to be a trend in modern brands nowadays to go for the 'hot-test', 'newest' thing, but really, it would probably be a whole lot easier to avoid all this by just running it past a group of next gen teenagers. They are, after all, the people in charge of making the Internet a funny place.

Seriously though, why would you want such super-brands to stop making some mistakes? After all, last time we checked, they're still run by humans. And you never know, amidst these hilarious screw ups might lie the next big idea that changes the world as we know it.
