

Fired Up

Fired Up is a runner where you are in control of a firefighter who quite misjudged the water pressure. The end result is that every time he turns on the hose he is flung into the air next to a burning building. Trying to correct his mistake, he then tries to put out the fire by aiming the hose at the burning windows. And that is where you step in. The game does not give you the controls of the direction and only allows you to regulate the water pressure. This makes it quite difficult to navigate around the windows and your firefighter gets burnt to a crisp quite often.

Another way of looking at this is that you require a lot more skill now to get a decent score. However, if you don't like the Flappy Bird mobile game design which puts forward extremely challenging levels with the aim of making you addicted to besting the game, you won't like this one. If you put out fires with exclamation marks hovering around them, you save a resident. The points you earn in the game help you unlock new residents to save, which sounds a lot like putting the cart before the horse. Ideally, saving the residents should give you money. Here is a game which could have been fairly decent but is botched due to some bad decisions, like lots of ads. It is not the worst of runners out there, but it is far from the best. It is worth playing only for a very casual gaming experience. It is rather a disappointment because it has been published by Noodlecake Studios which brought us the stellar Alto's Adventure and Mmm Fingers.

Cell 13

Cell 13 is a platformer about breaking out of cells and is oddly reminiscent of Portal with the theme and of Monument Valley with the execution. It has been developed by errorsevendev, known for titles like Laserbreak and Hexasmash. The game is about a circular robot that you can roll around the level in order to get out. Escape does not come easy and depends on whether you can solve the numerous puzzles scattered around each game. These challenges include ramps, portals, balls, glass elevators and laser bridges. The game is thoroughly entertaining in every level and is highly recommended if you have the slightest affinity for puzzles.

The sound design is superb and lends the game a deeply atmospheric feel. It makes you feel right at home in the dreamy landscape of Cell 13. The design of the game is incredibly slick and all the elements are uniquely designed to give a futuristic feel to the entire game. Even the menu is a work of art. If the levels are too difficult for you to solve, there is a link to the video walkthrough for each level in the pause menu itself. The game itself is beautifully spare and even the menu contains very few extra buttons. One problem is the frequency at which ads pop up. There is an ad every time you complete a level, restart a level or start the next level. These start from the second level onwards and pepper the rest of the game. Sometimes, the controls hang and the robot does not move like you want it to. However, the game has many things going for it. It is challenging without being frustrating and is a treat to the eyes and ears. This is stripped down, minimalist gaming at its sparkling best.

Drifty Chase

Drifty Chase, unsurprisingly, is a game about drifting while you are being chased by the police. The game is designed using polygonal design, a style which has flooded the market and has found application in games ranging from Pako to Crossy Roads. Nevertheless, the design is still pleasing to the eye in all its cartoonish glory.

A problem with the game is that it is absolutely filled with ads. These ads pop up every time you get caught, and at random too. Again, while it is understandable that these advertisements need to be included so the developers can earn, there are far more elegant ways of doing it. This game has a 'bribe' option where if you get caught you can bribe the police by watching a video and get away.

If you can get over the ads, Drifty Chase is a decent enough game. The drifting requires an acute sense of timing to ensure that you don't crash into another car. The scene changes between different cities often enough to keep you from getting bored. The places you can drive through range from New York to China Town. The longer you play, the faster the car will go. There are a number of cars, each with slightly different handling. Just stay away from the sides and don't crash into other cars.

The developers say that they will add more cars pretty soon which is something to look forward to. In conclusion, play Drifty Chase for a casual yet challenging drifting game that you can play anytime.
