

to make their game as interesting as possible – doing the same thing over and over again doesn't really seem like a fun or interesting thing to do. But despite that, there have been several extremely popular titles in the past where grinding has been an integral part of the game and people haven't minded going through with it either.

Don't get us wrong here, we're not saying a game needs grinding to be good, we're not even saying they should completely do away with it to be successful. Not every game is purely story driven, or action-oriented like say Uncharted, or Bayonetta – which are that need you to have a certain level or ability unlocked if you want to progress. This isn't limited to just single-player games, this kind of grinding is seen in many multiplayer and online games as well. So now that we've established that grinding is very much a thing and happens a lot these days, let's move on to the next topic!

The Bad Grind

For anyone to want to do something repetitively, it would help if the something – in this case bad game or one with bad mechanics is not fun to grind in, or rather why would you play it at all if it was bad. Heck, you never see people complaining about grinding in the good games. Okay, we didn't really need to even have mentioned that, Captain Obvious moment, sorry.

So yeah, bad games are not fun, period. Moving on. Another reason grinding might be a bad thing is loss of immersion.

plenty successful titles in their own right. These games don't need you to grind, it's optional, you don't HAVE to do it. You can always move forward, there's nothing stopping you from progressing. But at the same time, there are games that NEED you to grind, grinding – they were doing was somewhat enjoyable or at least slightly fun to do. In that case we wouldn't really mind doing it right? If it were something we could derive fun out of, then the game is doing its job of keeping you vested. So in order to achieve that, the game would need to have good mechanics at its core. That's the main reason; a

Immersion is important in games, especially in single player games which are story driven. Having a story you're following with interest abruptly stops to have you go grind a few levels in order to progress really breaks immersion. In fact, games that might have a really good story or narrative would actually suffer in contrast if the grinding ticks players off. This factor doesn't really affect multiplayer games or gamers as much. Almost all multiplayer games