

Facebook food

Facebook Pages now lets its US users order food, book tickets and much more through its pages, after the new update rollout

Vimeo's TV store launched

Vimeo's on-demand TV store is now available in 150 countries along with its pay per episode season packs. <http://dgit.in/VimeoODS>

Feature

If you're actually tired of all this bickering and want to see something that makes fun of all of these in one shot, go check out CollegeHumor's spoof of every tech commercial ever! Link: <http://dgit.in/ClgHmrTech> ally highlight that it was not so great and was overpriced compared to the Micromax Ninja 4 and 3.5, where she walks away without taking her phone back. (Watch: <http://dgit.in/MmxNnja>). Confusing? Just watch the damn ads!

Sega vs Nintendo

Perhaps one of the most infamous rivalries in the console world, Sega and Nintendo were waging ad wars before it was cool. This one takes us into history: back when Sega was trying to make a dent in Nintendo dominated North America, its CEO Michael Katz decided to take a two part approach. One of those parts involved competing head on with Nintendo via marketing. This led to the Nintendon't campaign.

Sega released a campaign for its Genesis console showcasing games featuring eminent celebrities associated with the titles, in a bid to popularise the console. It repeatedly stated features that the Genesis console had and specifically mentioned 'You can't do this on Nintendo', with the entire ad ending as 'Genesis does what Nintendon't'. If only the modern day Xbox vs PlayStation battles were half as interesting! (Watch: <http://dgit.in/Nntndnt>)

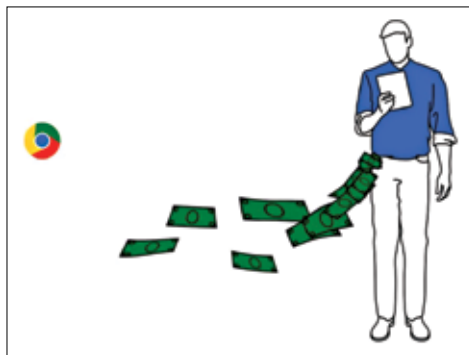

Microsoft vs Google

If someone ever went full guns blazing into an advertisement attack, it was Microsoft with its Scroogled advertisement campaign against Google between November 2012 and 2014. This campaign was created by Mark Penn and was mainly intended to highlight the shortcomings and faults in Google's products as compared to Microsoft's competing products (Bing, Outlook).

Initially, the attack was on Google Shopping for shifting to a Pay Per Click model, comparing it to Microsoft's Bing Shopping. In February 2013, Microsoft again attacked Google in this campaign over Gmail reading email content for targeted advertising and advised users to use Outlook instead. In the same year, Microsoft also attacked Android for alleged data leaks to developers from the Play Store as well as Google's insertion of advertisements in search results regardless of the environment in which they might be opened. (Watch: <http://dgit.in/Scrgled>)

In November 2013, Microsoft actually started selling Scroogled

Microsoft's Scroogled campaign wasn't really their highest point in good behaviour

merchandise through Microsoft Store. The Scroogled campaign even took on Google Chrome in allegations of data sharing and monetization.

Amazon vs Flipkart

Flipkart and Amazon's rivalry in the Indian e-commerce market is no secret. Both the companies have been fighting hard to get a bigger share of the pie and have each tried novel techniques to do so. In fact, it was just last month that we saw them face off each other again in the festive sales. Back in 2014, it was during this very festive sale that Amazon pulled off something both interesting and dubious.

Some time towards the fag end of the Big Billion Day sale in 2014, users who typed bigbillionday.com on their browsers found themselves on amazon.in. While there have been no official announcements or declarations regarding this, the issue seems to have been fixed after that. Hence, if you type bigbillionday.com into your browser now, you will be taken to Flipkart.com.

Uber vs Lyft

If you think that the biggest enemies that ride hailing companies have are the public transport unions and the government, then you are wrong. The truth is that they see their biggest enemies in each other. When it comes to Uber, a competitor that it faces across the world is Lyft. In 2014, Uber engaged in questionable tactics that involved possible encouragement of Uber employees to request and cancel thousands of Lyft rides, in turn, prompting Lyft drivers to jump ship to Uber. In fact, the Uber CEO himself has admitted to an attempt to sideline Lyft's funding.

Lyft had also sued their former COO, who had moved to Uber, when both the companies announced their carpooling features on the same day. Of course it wasn't a coincidence! When the COO jumped ship he took sensitive info with him.

And the winners are... all of us!

If you thought that tech biggies keep it classy, you're probably re-thinking that opinion after this article. And these are just the few examples that we found interesting. There are literally many more instances where these tech companies have battled and bickered like kids.

Some would argue that these companies are spending billions on what most mature people will describe as silly endeavours. To hell with those people! Keep the insults flying. You know what they say "Conflict is good. Conflict leads to innovation." Ok fine, they don't say that; we do. But for now let's get our popcorn out and enjoy the shenanigans! 🍿