

Tinder Boost goes live

Tinder now lets you skip the line and can show you your profile first in its feed with Tinder Boost. <http://dgit.in/TindrBst>

Caught in action

This Galaxy Note 7 caught fire and got recorded on a video, but Samsung might have tried to keep it under wraps. <http://dgit.in/N7Vdo>

Feature

ZENA

Many topics regarding women are rarely discussed, even by women, due to social stigma or other reasons. An app that is trying to change that is Zena, a platform for women to come together and ask questions, discuss topics and share expert advice. While the app itself needs improvement, the platform is quite active and helpful.

Play Store: <http://dgit.in/ZenaPStr> health issues pertaining to women are treated as taboo and not discussed openly. What that leads to is an incomplete awareness in women, usually of a younger age, about bodily functions like the menstrual cycle and even all the complications involved in pregnancy. A positive step in that direction are apps like Maya.

Maya is an app that aims to help women track their monthly menstrual cycles better. After entering some of the data, i.e. previous cycle dates, weight, temperature and more, the app can provide a lot of useful information like the prediction of next cycle dates, marking the dates on the phone's calendar, mood swings, graphs of weight and temperature, health tips and much more. The design of the app is in tune with the latest app design philosophy, with color coding for various types of data. This one is a must have for girls who are not too good with tracking their health themselves.

For pregnant women, keeping track of their own health along with the pregnancy is crucial. But due to the number of overwhelming changes, physical and emotional, that they go through during this period, it becomes a challenging task for almost any expecting mother. Sprout Pregnancy is one of the best apps out there for making that task easier, both on Android and iOS. In fact, it's an Apple 'Essential App for Parents' and comes highly recommended from physicians, who were also involved in its development stages.

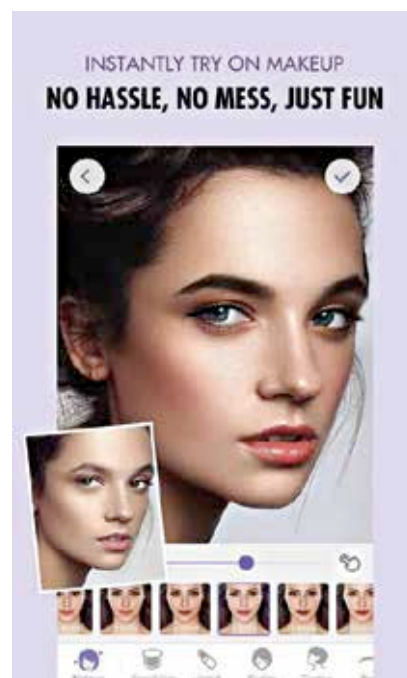

Sprout features daily and weekly information about the mother and her baby. With the help of tools like Weight tracker, kick counter and contraction timer, it keeps the mother educated and informed about her pregnancy. And armed with this information, the mother can also plan doctor visits and more on the app. One of the most interesting features of the app is the customizable lifelike fetal imagery, which also shows the number of days remaining to the expected delivery date. And all of this can be tracked on a pregnancy journal, which can later be exported as an ebook. Any expecting mother would treasure that!

Make up

Not to sound stereotypical, but sometimes it takes a lot of effort for women to get their makeup right. All the options and techniques involved plus the time it takes to re-do anything that goes wrong makes it a very tedious process unless you're a makeup whiz with a knack for it. And even then, a way to try it out without actually having to use up any cosmetics or materials can be very useful. Makeup plus is an app that lets you do exactly that.

Recommended by makeup artists, the app has some really powerful tools that are pretty easy to use for anyone familiar with mobile photo editing apps. You can take a selfie (or a picture) within the app to edit it or choose one from the gallery in camera mode. In this mode, you can apply some pretty standard makeup filters or download more of them! These filters and the way your features are detected can be manipulated down to the last detail. You can also directly open the Editor to edit specific features of your facial makeup – like lipstick, mascara and even contouring. Saves a lot of hit-and-miss effort, doesn't it?

If you're not sure how to proceed with this, tutorials are also available on the app. Also, in the settings, you can set your standard preferences for the camera, photo and even your skin tone. You actually may not need makeup for those selfies ever again!

Fashion

The Indian e-commerce boom has largely been driven by a few categories, one of which is fashion. Initially, the purchases were largely driven by competitive pricing and offers, but the Indian customer has evolved to a stage where the choice is being made based on current trends, celebrity preferences, special occasions and more. This has led to the rise of fashion curation apps and when it comes to quality, one that is getting a lot of attention steadily is Hippily.

