

Mobile Madness

You have to try these games out on your smartphone!

By Anusha 'Trillian' Sinha

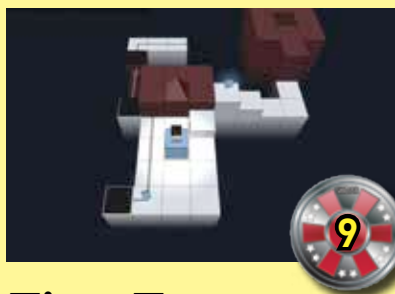

Masky

Masque of the Red Death is a short story by Edgar Allan Poe about the plague and a party where the richest try to avoid it while the poor die on the streets. Masky seems a tad inspired by the story, although it's not as macabre. The game features different rooms where a masked character dances and is joined by others. The one touch control simply requires you to control the tilt of the dancers to prevent them from falling to the floor. Different characters have different power-ups and affect the speed or tilt of the level. The game features a unique design with brightly coloured line drawings on a black background. The rooms are based on different themes, ranging from a hospital to a graveyard. There are different masked characters to unlock with in game currency. Each of these masks comes with a unique soundtrack and background design. While the game-play is quite linear, like in the vast majority of mobile games, the frantic shuffling of the masked creatures across the dance floor will keep you returning to Masky, and often.

8.5

Time Turner

In Time Turner, you make your moves according to how they will affect your past. In each brilliantly crafted, puzzle, you guide a lone-some cubic figure across walkways to a tesseract. Once you collect the tesseract, the timeline jumps back to the very first point you started from. The only difference is that this time there is a temporal image of your character from the past while you can make some different moves. This sounds very complicated but a level or two into the game is enough to let you get the hang of the mechanics. The hardest part is remembering what your own moves were and timing them keeping in mind where you'd like to go once you get the tesseract. If you're not too careful, you'll end up running into your past self. If that happens, you cause a tear in the fabric of the space time continuum and simply disappear from the world together! Well, no one said time travel was going to be easy. The game looks extremely polished and the cuboidal design of the characters and levels works just fine. Time Turner is simply a puzzle you have to try before your time's up.

Outfolded

The ability to visualise objects in your mind is a pretty neat skill and Outfolded requires you to do just that. Your objective is to carve a path out across a gridded landscape using a limited number of three-dimensional objects in your inventory. You can unfold these figures in any direction as you try to make your way towards the goal. These figures range from a simple cube to a Tetris block. Also, an unlimited number of undos means that you are free to make mistakes while trying to find a path that works. Which is quite neat because you also get to see the object retracing the steps and become whole again. There are hints too in case you get stuck. The game loads a bit slowly the first time you start it and lags a bit on older devices. This is surprising because the graphics are minimalist but it doesn't make much of a difference. Like the official blurb reads, 'if you like puzzles, Outfolded is for you. And if you don't like puzzles, Outfolded is definitely for you.'

8.4