Adobe's Lightroom for Android can now edit RAW files with any camera from your phone, following iOS update last summer.

expect was a letter from the Chairman of the company to the employees less than a month later in which he admitted that the company was in a cash crunch.

In the letter, Jia Yueting admits that sustaining the headfirst rush into an array of businesses, ranging from smartphones to electric cars has caused the LeEco group to face a dire cash situation. He also apologises and promises to invest $10 million into the company while cutting his own salary to 1 yuan, while assuring the employees that they will follow a moderate pace of growth going forward.

As if this wasn't enough, rival smartphone maker Xiaomi jumped at this opportunity to draw focus onto the lack of clarity surrounding LeEco's outstanding debt. This led to a unpleasant exchange of responses over social media from both the companies that could and should have been avoided.

These fundraising issues haven't been a bouquet of roses for the company with issues cropping up in approval of state bonds for LeEco's electric car factory in the US. Well, as they say, don't bite off more than you can chew.

No Man's Sky

Remember when a little known studio called Hello Games came out with the promise of making a game like none before – where the universe will be infinite and unique for each player, and anyone could become a space explorer in the true sense, with planets full of lifeforms and literally infinite possibilities of gameplay. Yes, we are talking about No Man's Sky. The game was teased in 2013 and since then, till its release in August 2016, there was buildup after buildup which raised the expectations of the gaming community to unprecedented heights.

Come August 2016, when the game actually hit the PS4 and the PC something unprecedented did indeed happen. All the procedural generation could not hide the fact that the game was barely anything more than a repetitive planet to planet jumping simulator with little new to offer after the first few hours of gameplay. While it registered an initial concurrent player count of 212,000 on Steam – the highest ever of any game – as players gradually figured out the limitations of the game they started dropping out. Just a week after launch the count was down to 23,000 and as of September 2016 it came down to as low as 2,100. Sales dropped by 81% in UK by the second week itself.

There were numerous reactions and videos posted online that explicitly listed the features that Hello Games had promised and not delivered on with No Man's Sky. At the moment of this article being written, the game had an Overall User review rating of 'Mostly Negative' with more than 75,000 reviews contributed.

Take this and repeat it 18.6 quintillion times

From the most anticipated gaming title ever, No Man's Sky quite effortlessly went on to become a perfect example of an over-marketed, over-promising, under-delivering game. The world of gaming can get repetitive and boring. And when something that promises to be fresh and ground breaking disappoints on that field, the gaming world will not be forget or forgive. This was definitely the biggest fail of 2016 in the world of gaming.

Well ... if things went the other way!

Startups that shut shop

The startup industry isn't exactly a forgiving one. While there are quite a few things that could go wrong in a startup's lifecycle and mess everything up, there are also some pretty obvious mistakes that sometimes condemn startups to doom. And when that happens, there's usually no other option but to close down or change the direction entirely. This year was no different a quite a few significant startups had to close down. Take PepperTap for example. The hyper funded on demand grocery delivery startup officially closed down in April 2016. While the reasons weren't officially released by the company, it is quite evident that the online grocery sector has been suffering for a while now. PepperTap had earlier claimed to ship about 20,000 orders per day in December 2015 whereas reports say that towards the end it shipped as less as 1,000 per month. Even if the numbers may not be correct, the fact that they shut down their grocery delivery business and switched to being a ecommerce logistics company does speak for itself. Another grocery delivery company that shut down was Localbanya. Similarly, in other sectors, food delivery startup
