Feature

good or bad, or if it's even compatible with your existing set of gadgets.

Also, if a game gives you pre-order bonuses that actually help you win better, you know that the game isn't being fair. There are players who have waited for the actual launch and they deserve an equal chance too. An easy way to avoid the urge to pre-order is to think about all the other games that you can buy with the money you don't spend on pre-orders, especially during a Steam sale.

I will not be biased towards or against any particular brand

Essentially, don't be a fanboy and don't be a hater. Neither does you any good. For starters – being a fanboy makes you blind to the flaws of the company and its product. Apple fanboy? Accept that the dongle-hungry Macbook was a bad design decision. Windows fanboy? Silently think about Windows 8 whenever you feel the urge to hate.

On the other hand, being a hater makes you blind to products or features which are actually good from a certain company. What could you do? Why, it's simple! Just don't be biased – see every product as a fresh launch and give every company an equal opportunity to win your favour. Grudges and biases never did any good.

I will get into shape

You must know how important this is – especially for us geeks who mostly spend our days sitting on a chair in a stagnant position in front of a computer screen we've been staring at for waaaaayyy too long. You will be horrified to find out that the number of spinal problems, heart diseases and other old age issues are now very common in the below-30 demography. So, this time, don't ignore the health resolution.

How can you keep it? Get apps like Nike+ Training Club on your phone. This one in particular suggests workout plans depending on your requirements. And once you get started on a plan, each workout comes with detailed demonstrations of each particular exercise and follow-up queries to dynamically adjust the plan depending on how it's working out for you. Along with this, get a fitness tracker. Before you smirk - they work. They might not be entirely accurate, at least the lower-end ones, but having one gives you a rough idea of how much you walk, your non-moving durations, etc. And knowledge is power, my friend.

I will not procrastinate

This year – get everything done. Gone are the days when you had to rely solely on your memory and willpower to actually be responsible and active. There are a number of note-taking apps out there and our favorite is Google Keep. It is the perfect combination of simplicity and versatility. To begin with, Keep allows you to colour code your notes so that you can identify which note is about which topic easily. Within notes, Keep allows to create checklists and tick them off.

Keep also allows you to set reminders for certain notes, even repeated ones. So each day, at a particular time, a note could pop-up showing you your monthly goals. And if you've had trouble getting up for all this to happen - get Rock Clock! Now! In this app, you set goals to begin with, and each day your alarm reminds you of that goal with a motivational message from none other than Dwayne 'The Rock' Johnson. And yeah, this doesn't have a snooze button, Rock's not a big fan of that one!

I will go cashless

While the debate around the recent demonetization move still rages on, there is no doubt that a digital economy and digital payments are actually beneficial to the country – and you, for that matter. For starters, on every digital payment, you're assured that the money is accounted for and the service you're paying for will be given to you. No flying blind with cash. Also, with digital payments, your entire finance is mapped out appropriately so you pay the tax that is due, not more, not less.

Along with that, of course, digital payments are way too easy these days and almost everyone is doing them. It leaves no requirement for you to carry pocket change and each time you transfer the money, by design you get a receipt - so no more trouble with those reimbursements! And on top of that, most digital wallets offer tonnes of cashbacks and discounts so you'll be saving a hell lot of money for that next config upgrade you've been planning.

Also, do try out UPI, it's a pretty neat way to transfer money without revealing any of your bank or personal details. It works on top of the existing
