A Hey Akhil, this problem arises because of a driver issue of a particular hardware. Try to change that setting back then if you can remember. If you can't find the same setting again, go into the BIOS and reset defaults ("Load default BIOS settings" or "Load Default Settings", or something similar depending on your BIOS), and that should fix it.

Also, you can try booting into Safe Mode and reinstalling the driver which is at fault. You will be able to check the corresponding faulty driver from device manager. You could also go ahead and try to repair your system with the Windows Installation Disk using a USB drive.

If you can't even get to the BIOS, just look at your motherboard manual for the clear CMOS button or jumper. When the PC is shut down, either use that jumper or button, or take out the CMOS battery, leave it out for 15 minutes, put it back in and start your PC. That should do the trick.

Q Video compression

Hey Digit experts, I own a Sony PMW camera which records 1080p HD videos. But a small recording of about five minutes consumes around 650 MB. But Hollywood movies around two hours have the size of 900 MB, which kept me thinking about a way to compress video files without altering the video quality or maybe altering to a small extent. Please help me find a way to compress videos.

– Sharan

A Hey Sharan, the Hollywood movies you're talking about go through several passes of compression with changes in their bitrate, audio bitrate, resolution, etc. The video that you record has hardly any compression algorithms applied to it, hence the huge file size. If you want to compress your recorded videos, you can use a free tool called Handbrake. It's a fairly easy software to use where you'll be able to compress your videos to smaller sizes without losing much of the quality. There are very helpful presets also available which can get the job done in not time.

Handbrake is great for video compression

Q Missing system file

Dear Digit Team,

I have recently bought an HP laptop from HP Online Shopping whose details are as follows: HP Pavilion 15-au626TX with three years onsite warranty. When I boot up the laptop, it is not able to show the desktop screen and displays a message mentioning a system32 file is missing (File location not found). Please send some helpful advice regarding this. Thank you.

– Saksham

A Hey Saksham, it would have been helpful if you had mentioned the name of the file. Nonetheless, this error is usually caused when a particular file in the system32 directory gets corrupted or deleted. This is usually caused by a virus. What you should do is write down the name of the missing file, boot up your laptop in the Safe Mode and execute a search on your system for that particular file, in case it was moved to another location. If you find it, move it back to the system32 directory. If you can't find the file, then repairing your system using the Windows Installation Disk is your best bet.
