

Credit: Karl Palutke via Flickr

The force is strong with us able to differentiate between night and day, or completely forgets eating, drinking, and sleeping in a bid to emerge victorious. However, this does not mean that just because someone has the most kills in Call of Duty or Overwatch he or she is a geek! But chances are high that someone who obsessively finishes Bloodborne and Dark Souls is one. In terms of gaming, geeks are usually those people who know everything about the game. For instance, what engine the game has been created on, just how long the game has been in production, and some even memorize every single dialogue featured in the game. This is the sign of a true geek!

Geeks are the kind of people who'd watch The Big Bang Theory rather than Boardwalk Empire. C'mon which geek wouldn't relate to either Sheldon or Leonard? The love for Star Wars, Star Trek, video games, physics, comic books, and trains, among others, are almost identical to what geeks prefer.

Usually, geeks are emotionally attached to their hobbies. So, a geek will vehemently defend their favorite game or movie series even if that particular title has not turned out great. They are willing to stand up for what they believe in – that's a pretty telltale geek trait. This trait is also usually responsible for the formation of Fanboyism.

Geeks are usually known to develop a niche within their own interest. For example, a geek who is absolutely devoted to computers may be further devoted to Intel and may hate AMD. A geek such as this would look up every single detail about Intel CPUs and would likely defend single core performance against the Ryzen onslaught till the end of the world..

From time to time, they might talk to "outsiders" about their obsession when others asked about it during the course of everyday conversations. Though they might get exasperated when others don't get their ideas or jargon.

TO GEEKDOM AND BEYOND!

Geeks are a diverse bunch with one common quality – passion. Sure some geeks may like comic books, while others may prefer computers and tech stuff, but at the end all geeks possess passion and the drive to master their interest. How many normies (normal people) can say they have truly mastered something?

Geeks know things. Lots of things. Not just the things that you take tests on but random stuff like the combination to Kirk's Safe, the name of Chewbacca's home planet and many other amazing factoids gathered through the geeky explorations and stowed away in a corner of their brain. Many of these things will never be found inside books, but they are nonetheless a part of the human culture.

Thomas Edison, Steve Wozniak, Linus Torvalds – just a few of the geeks who make the high tech world of today possible. Geeks have left their mark on the world and in outer space with their tireless pursuit to solve problems. In fact, it is highly likely that behind every revolutionary scientific invention or innovation is a geek. This has been true in the past and the future is also surely going to bear testament to the brilliance of geeks.

Geeks have their own fashion – Geek Chic. Their own music – NerdCore. They have multiple conferences and gatherings for every interest. The anti-social geek is a myth. They build things, write blogs, broaden minds, publish geeky magazines, read them, and celebrate their geekiness. In fact, you could say the geek have already inherited the earth. So congratulations dear reader, you are now part owners of the world! Who knew, eh? 📺