Strong Medicine

The future of health is bionic rashant's phone was ringing. He didn't need to look at the corner of the AR display in front of him to know that it was his mom – it was about time for her to call anyway.

"Did you eat your lunch, son?"

"Yes, mom. How's dad doing?" They had just started him on CloudPan, an artificial smart pancreatic stickers from Biothica.

"I won't say he is exactly happy. But you don't worry about that beta, I'll take care of him"

"No mom, that's not how this works. Give the phone to him"

Prashant's dad didn't like the idea of these stickers. But then he didn't like the automated insulin drip either and that's what got him in the shape he was in right now. It wasn't optional for him to like this or not.

"Hello"

"Hello, Dad. Mom was mentioning you aren't exactly fond of the stickers?"

"Of course beta. Now, who is fond of medicine? You tell me."

"They prescribe it for a reason you know. Not for likeability. If your opinion on whether you should take a medicine or not mattered to your health, you would be the healthiest man on the planet right now. But it doesn't."

"I know, I know, where am I saying I won't take it?"

"But that's what you're going to do. That's what you've done with the insulin injections, then the inhaler tablets, then the automated drip and now it's going to be this. But not on my watch.

You live under my roof now and if necessary I'll make you use it myself."

"There won't be any need for that beta. Don't worry."

"Great. Now get some rest. We have to go for the checkup today"
"Okay. See you later"

Prashant was already on the Biothica website before the call had ended. Not many people knew about this technology so it was still available quite easily. But as more and more people were seeing the advantages of bio-stickers compared to automated drips, their demand was gradually rising. The ease of use was also another factor. Compared to the servicing that was required on the automated drips, with its sensor array and bio-printed capillaries, the stickers were like....well, stickers. He double checked the appointment time – 7pm. Four more hours.

He looked at the watch. 6:45pm. They were probably already there, waiting for him to arrive to get things started. This was usually the earliest the doctor was available, and Prashant has made sure that they got the first appointment. Walking up the slope to the clinic door, he felt a slight creak on his right knee. His own foot needed looking into. It was replaced after an unfortunate accident a few years ago on the expressway, and it has been a while since it has been due for an upgrade to a bioprinted alternative. But right now,

Smart patches are a strong candidate for the future of medicine delivery
