hile you were lurking on the internet and chuckling at doggos, you may have come across the term "PC Master Race". Casually thrown in for just about every gaming meme, it's usually depicted by a long white-haired yellow guy as pictured above. It was coined by Yahtzee Croshaw, who reviews video games for the Escapist in a satirical series called "Zero Punctuation". The primary intention of the term was to describe the elite bunch of PC gamers who blindly threw money at any new hardware that arrived in the market. Think of them as the same people who comment "first" on every YouTube video. But instead, their first is the first one to buy (and even shudder pre-order) the latest 60 core / 120 thread processor. Gradually, this mockery turned into reality when misled gamers started glorifying how powerful their gaming rigs were because it cost more with their unlocked processor, quad-GPU and 128GB of RAM. Little did they know that games such as Assassin's Creed Unity and Batman: Arkham Knight were on their way to the PC. So much for those big bucks spent on their giant electricity gobbling monsters.

Being part of the PCMR isn't simply about buying and assembling all the hardware from an "epic build of the month" video you just watched on YouTube. It's definitely not about posting pictures of your amazing custom liquid-cooled RGB-enabled tempered glass rig on Instagram with the hashtag #hardcoregamer. Add passion to these theatrics and then we might be getting somewhere. Before we move forward, let's address the huge misconception that in order to qualify for the community, you need to own an over-the-top ultra high end gaming rig. You seriously don't need to! You can be a member of PCMR with just a potato PC. Heck, you don't even have to own a PC to be welcomed into the brotherhood. It all boils down to your enthusiasm towards learning about PCs and gaming in general. As you watch and learn, you slowly realise several things, which can be deemed as life lessons in the long run. And that's exactly what we intend to do, by going full Mr. Miyagi on PCMR.

MAKE BETTER DECISIONS

An expensive gaming rig doesn't ensure the best performance. Speaking of CPUs, not all the games are optimised to take
