HTC U11

A flagship that could have been better

It's easy to write off HTC in the current market but the HTC U11 is something new and it's something different. It's got the good elements of the HTC 10, and is better in a lot of ways. From the front, the HTC U11 looks almost entirely like the HTC 10, but it's got a liquid glass surface on the back. It sort of changes colour depending on how light falls on it. The U11 has a 5.5 inch QHD display with Gorilla Glass 5 protection and the colours aren't punchy so to speak, but they're neither too warm, nor too bright. Amongst the many advertised features of the HTC U11 is the new Edge Sense feature. The U11 is squeezable and you can customise the feature to launch any app, or perform other function, like turn on the torch, launch the camera and so on. There's even a distinction for squeeze-and-hold actions and a short squeeze.

The HTC U11 is a flagship class flagship, and that's the best way to put it. Having said that, I would choose the Galaxy S8 or the LG G6 over this in a heartbeat. They look better, sport newer technologies and feel more premium in my opinion. Edge Sense is unique, but I would pick the Edge display over it, even though Sense Companion is as hamstrung as Bixby. HTC fans will not complain with this phone, but as good as the HTC U11 is, it's just not good enough anymore. We routinely picked the OnePlus 5 and Galaxy S8 over this.

SoundMagic E10BT

Totally worth the money

When one of our all time favourite in-ear headphones decides to shed its 3.5mm jack and go completely wireless, we sit up and take notice. The E10BT is the bluetooth version of the much-loved E10 series from SoundMagic.

Having the battery and bluetooth transmission circuitry on the cable makes the driver housing fairly light and compact – making it more comfortable for longer listening sessions.

The only problem we felt was that the cable is a little too long if you clip it to your collar. A fair bit of slack remains. But it's not long enough to go to, say, your sleeve. In terms of build quality there's nothing to write home about – no fibre braiding, reflective paint etc – but it's certainly not flimsy.

In terms of performance the E10BT manages to retain everything we love about the series. The sound is accurate, and compared to the BLU-200 it has a more open mid range. This makes tracks sound rich without being overtly warm. When the BLU-200 was released, we liked its audio quite a bit, but the E10BT is a better performer. The vocals produced are absolutely clear and upfront, while the bass is tight. In fact the bass is just about right – definitely not overpowering.

At the ₹2500 to ₹2800 price point, there's absolutely no reason not to go for the SoundMagic E10BT if you are looking for a pair of well balanced Bluetooth headphone. In fact, this pair dislodges the Brainwavz BLU-200 as our go-to recommendation for affordable wireless in-ears.
