WHAT'S NEW

The Jetsons live action

The Jetsons was a cartoon about a family living 100 years in the future that aired for the first time in the 1960's. The original show ran for just one season back in 1962-63 with new episodes added later in the 80's. In the 1990's, the show was taken to the big screen as a film. There was also a crossover between the Jetsons and the stone age family, the Flintstones in 1987. The one-and-a-half-hour crossover was titled The Jetsons Meet the Flintstones.

The upcoming show, however, will not be animated. It will rather be a multi-camera, live-action reboot executively produced by Back to the Future's Robert Zemeckis and ABC, working together, and written by Gary Janetti who has worked on shows like Will & Grace and Family Guy. What remains most exciting to be seen is how the futuristic family will be represented in live action.

The Sarahah mania

Sarahah is one of those trends where even mentioning the word would incite a series of cringes from a room – maybe even from those who have tried it and are now trying to hide it. This anonymous feedback app took the internet by storm last month and almost overwhelmed social media with random messages from unknown strangers. Some were good, some were bad, some were downright pointless. But one thing that was common overall was the perception that beyond a certain ego boost (or deflation) Sarahah is harmless. In reality, it is far from that. One of the most dangerous things about Sarahah is how popular it has become. It has reached a point where people can come up to you and ask you if you're on Sarahah. You could very well be considered an outsider if you're not. And that kind of peer pressure, or FOMO, might have pushed a lot of people onto the platform who weren't really ready for what they were getting themselves into.
