Dunkirk

Drowning in sheer helplessness

★★★★☆ | Dunkirk is not just another action-

packed war movie in which the director takes too much liberty with the historical incident on which the movie is based. The events of the Dunkirk Evacuation took place over 10 days from the 26th of May to the 4th of June, and Christopher Nolan hasn't tried to cram all that into a 2 hour movie.

That would have been a disservice to us movie watchers, and disrespectful to those who actually had to endure the constant offensive attacks from the Nazis. Instead, Dunkirk follows one lad throughout his time on the beach. And by doing so, you are thrust into his shoes, and get a taste of the sheer helplessness that occurs in wars.

So many young men found themselves repeatedly backpedalling in face of the relentless German offensive. This movie just gets it right – each attempt to escape is met with failure, and costs many lives. It's not just a physical assault, but also one that kick your psyche awake, in boot camp style.

Casting fresh faces with a background in theatre was an excellent move as you get a clean slate to begin with. However, Nolan throws a few known faces into the mix as well. And with Hans Zimmer lending his wizardry, the experience is even better. The entire movie is broken down into different but interconnected perspectives of the same set of events giving the viewer a well-rounded overview of the situation. If we had to nitpick, we'd say Nolan took it a bit too far, but the overall effect of this approach worked well. Dunkirk might not follow the same formula as well known war movies such as Saving Private Ryan, Black Hawk Down, Das Boot, etc. but it sure ends up in the same league!

Aho Girl

★★★★☆ | The story follows the everyday life of a free-spirited, airheaded high school girl named Yoshiko who loves eating

bananas and manages to get zeros in all her exams. She constantly hangs around with her studious neighbour Akuru who has to deal with all her annoyances. Aho Girl is a commendable anime for anyone looking for a good, hearty laugh.

Gamers!

★★★★☆ | Unlike other game-oriented anime like Sword Art Online or Log Horizon, this comedy inversely portrays the important aspect of how playing video games too much can affect our day to day and social life. If you've ever watch "Sakurasou no pet na kanojo" and enjoyed it, this is another one you cannot miss. As gamers ourselves, we highly recommend it.

Tsurezure Children

★★★★☆ | Young love-Ah, the overwhelming emotions that turn us into adults. This one's a compilation of romantic stories that take place between various high school students.

There are no main characters and each episode runs for 12 minutes, made up of short plays. This romcom has plenty of lovable characters and hilarious scenes making it super satisfying to watch.
