

New character reveal

A new trailer from Dragon Ball FighterZ has introduced a new character, and she is Android 21. <http://digit.in/DBFZAndrd21>

Making of Blade Runner 2049

Go behind the scenes with the new video released where you get to witness the making of the sequel. <http://digit.in/BlrRnrMkng>

A pointless race

The push to release quickly and make a buck might be ruining the gaming industry

Manish Rajesh | manish@digit.in

If there's anything worse than pre-ordering in the gaming industry, it's rushed game production. The gaming industry has gotten into this bad habit of churning out incomplete games every year – all for the sake of making a quick buck. Big publishers set short deadlines for devs, which in turn forces them to cut corners in order to meet those deadlines. The result is an unfinished product that ends up looking like nothing but a cash grab.

If that wasn't enough, they have the audacity to charge us even more for subsequent DLCs, which honestly, should have been a part of the main game in the first place. We're being forced into paying twice for two halves of a game sometimes! Very few developers do DLCs right anymore.

This trend is especially popular with brands like EA, Activision and Ubisoft, who seem to want to milk the living daylights out of every game or franchise. Yes, we're looking squarely at you Call of Duty, Battlefield, Assassin's Creed and FIFA franchises – actually any EA sports game really at this point.

Indie games are becoming increasingly popular because of this – since they're not governed by a large publisher forcing them to adhere to unreasonable deadlines, they can take their time with their games, which results in generally better experiences. In fact, it's the indie games that really feel fresh and creative now, while the AAA titles seem to be more 'ctrl + c', 'ctrl + v' of a formula that worked once many years ago!

A recent example would be Mass Effect Andromeda. We're huge fans of the series here, so when Andromeda was announced we excited. Not enough to pre-order it of course, because we're not that stupid. Considering the buggy mess that was released, we made a good call. Facial animations looked worse than the first Mass Effect, and that released a decade ago, and the game was plagued with bugs and glitches. So all they did was show us beautiful trailers of a game we used to love, then released a broken game, and probably used pre-order money to fix bugs after the final release?

We waited a whole decade for the next in the series, so surely they know that we could wait for a few months longer. We'd much rather wait and play an amazing game than get an unfinished disaster a lot sooner.

How such big companies, developers and franchises can fail to understand the simple rule, "Don't piss off your customers" is beyond us. Maybe they're taking us all for granted, because we gamers are so starved for good games that we blow up money on pretty much everything these days. Teach them a lesson, support the indie game scene, and stop pre-ordering these disasters! 