

THE INDIAN AUTO INDUSTRY STEPS UP

From performance to luxury, the latest launches are proof of more discerning choices

PORSCHE 911 GT3

You might argue that this is still more of a novelty than anything else, but the Indian supercar market is surely growing. Reading these signs, Porsche has brought a new member of its 911 club to India - the 911 GT3. Immediately identifiable with its massive spoiler, the Porsche 911 GT3 was launched in India in October, and goes right up against the Mercedes-AMG GT-R - a similarly priced supercar that was launched earlier this year.

The 4-litre V8 produces 500bhp, and 460Nm of torque. If that's just numbers for you, the 911 GT3 reaches 100kph from standstill in 3.4 seconds, and 200kph in 11 seconds. That is seriously fast. To tame all that power, you get a Track Precision application, along with racing mechanics integrated into the multi-colour display of the instrument cluster. These show engine performance, driving statistics, split and whole lap timings, and other details to enhance your driving prowess.

But, the 911 GT3 is not just about racing. It comes with alcantara-clad dash and steering wheel, premium Bose speakers, and a full fledged infotainment system with integrated SAT-NAV, a CD/DVD drive, USB and AUX ports, and Bluetooth connectivity. There is also two-zone automatic climate control, and even functional concealed cup holders. You would not have seen cup holders in sports cars, would you?

The Porsche 911 GT3 is a work of art inside, and is tuned to cruise along the highway as well as go on a wild track chase. It is priced at ₹2.31 crore, and is meant to be the crowning jewel of every car enthusiast's dream. If you happen to get one, do let us know at editor@digit.in

SKODA KODIAQ

The Skoda Kodiaq is the first luxury SUV from Skoda that has come to India. The company has aimed the Kodiaq at the luxury SUV segment that the likes of BMW, Mercedes Benz and Audi rule. To its benefit, the Kodiaq is priced very competitively in comparison to luxury SUVs, and offers loads of attractive gizmos to lure customers to itself.

Alongside the large, 8-inch touchscreen panel that adorns the spacious dashboard, the Kodiaq also gets a 360-degree camera, handsfree automatic parking, and even a 'sleeping kit', which adds retractable wings to the middle seat headrests, and two blanket holders in front of them. These will hold your head in position, and you can simply tuck away the blanket and take a quick nap on the large bucket seats, without waking up to a stiff neck. It gets Canton-powered speakers, a host of connectivity options, Android Auto, Apple CarPlay and MirrorLink, among other nifty touches like the ambient lighting system and the massive sunroof.

At 4697mm, the Skoda Kodiaq has a longer wheelbase than many of its similarly priced competitors. For instance, the Audi Q3, priced at almost exactly the same point, offers a 4388mm wheelbase. The 2-litre diesel engine produces power-torque figures of 150bhp-340Nm, and is combined with a 7-speed DSG gearbox. With all of this and more, the Skoda Kodiaq is priced at ₹35,49,000, which serves as yet another reminder of more premium cars becoming available in India, at increasingly affordable prices. One thing is abundantly clear - it's a good time to be a premium car enthusiast in India right now.
