Fake WhatsApp

A spoof copy of WhatsApp on the Google Play store was downloaded by over a million users who, instead of the popular messaging app, got a bundle of ads instead. The fake app was nearly indistinguishable from the real thing, all because of an invisible space placed at the end of the name.

Searching for WhatsApp on the Google Play store brings up a number of similar spoof apps, all with slight variations of the original's name, using either asterisks, commas or extra spaces. Additionally, they've all got an average rating of 4-stars, which makes it harder to distinguish between the spoof and the real thing.

The rogue developer changed the name after getting unwanted attention on Reddit, where it was first spotted.

Doogee S60

If you haven't heard about Doogee, we don't blame you. While they're not well-known, their smartphones pack pretty powerful specs.

With the Doogee S60, for as low as $280 (the price here seems to vary depending on the seller but we've seen it going for as low as ₹18,000 approx), you get a Mediatek Helio P25 with an Octa-core CPU, 6GB of RAM, a 21MP camera, and a massive 5,580mAh battery with both quick and wireless charging.

But you'll actually want it for its ruggedness. The Doogee S60 sports an aluminium and high-density polycarbonate casing. The display is Corning Gorilla Glass 5. The S60 also has an IP68 rating.

Ike

We've all tried to keep track of the things we need to do at our work, home or any other context in some way or another. Unless you happen to be a super organised memory-whiz, that task isn't easy and quite prone to be confusing. But Ike is an app that takes organising your to-dos to a whole new level.

While retaining the familiarity of the list-based approach of to-do apps, Ike adds the Eisenhower priority matrix into the mix. According to the matrix, tasks under any list can be divided into four types based on their urgency and importance. These classified categories are Focus, Goals, Fit In and Backburner, and each category describes the approach that this app wants you to take quite perfectly. And quite helpfully, the app creates a couple of lists like Inbox, Home and Work for you, all divided in the manner explained earlier.

With the Pro version, that costs ₹100, you get the super useful widgets that let you take this compartmentalised view of your tasks right to your home-screen, so that you always know how many tasks, either urgent or important or both are left. You can also add images, voice notes, and location based reminders in the unlocked Pro version. With all of these interesting features, Ike is definitely worth a try.

Cleanfox

Cleanfox takes care of overflowing inboxes, and it does so in a spectacularly organised fashion. After analysing the contents of your inbox, it categorises your unwanted emails by sender and allows you to delete and unsubscribe with a single tap!

Tootle

An all new freelancing platform that works on location-based jobs, Tootle also adds a layer of security by requiring all users to verify themselves by uploading an identity proof. You can choose from a variety of jobs, all similarly verified as well!

Kindle Lite

With all the benefits of the full fledged Kindle app in a 2MB package, Kindle Lite is tailor-made for poor network conditions. You also get access to the full fledged Kindle store as well as the ability to start reading books before they're fully downloaded.
