Two battery packs

The iPhone X houses two batteries inside, something we rarely see in smartphones these days. This was done probably to accommodate the rest of the components inside, rather than compromising on the battery capacity.

Green line on the display

A batch of devices have been affected with a bug that displays a green line on the right edge of the screen. The cause is still unknown, and since Apple isn't sure whether they can solve this issue with a software update, the company is replacing those units.

Not meant for cold climates

Several owners have reported that the phone becomes unresponsive in cold temperatures. Touches on the screen aren't recognised and the workaround for now is to lock and unlock the phone while Apple works on a software update.

120Hz touch sample rate

Although the display has a 60Hz refresh rate, the iPhone X has a 120Hz touch sample rate. This means that the display frame rate remains the same while the touch input rate has been doubled to increase the screen response time, making gestures and animations smoother.
