

Ola buys Foodpanda

Ola to enter the food-delivery business with their purchase of the Foodpanda in India.
<http://digit.in/OlaPanda>

Paris - Latest AWS region

AWS launched a new region in Paris making it easier for tech companies to comply with privacy rules.
<http://digit.in/AWSParis>

In their right mind

M ental health isn't really a topic of discussion in India. In fact, it wouldn't really be too wrong to say that it is taboo in all but a select few circles of the country. On the other hand, there are alarmingly few mental health professionals in the country. Some studies peg the number at one psychiatrist per 2 lakh people and others at one per 4 lakh! Needless to say, this is ridiculous! In fact, the situation is actually worse, because there are less than 10 psychiatrists, total, for entire states in India! For a country that spends a mere 0.0036

Mental health startups in India are bringing a much needed change to the country's mental wellbeing

Arnab Mukherjee | arnab@digit.in percent of its budget on mental health, we certainly seem to be in desperate need of help in dealing with mental health issues. Thankfully, it seems like some startups are doing exactly this.

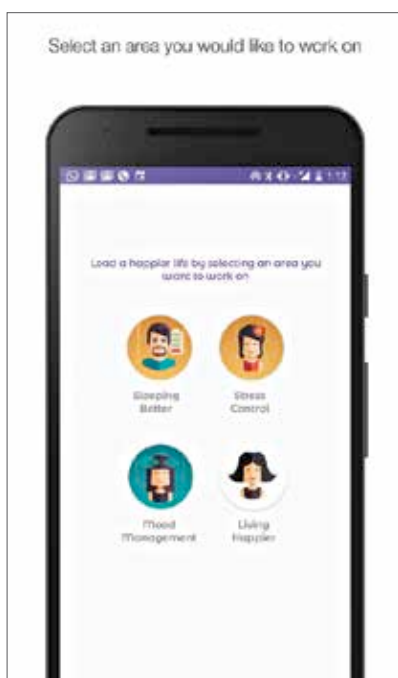

AGGREGATING PLATFORMS

While urban areas have a high concentration of mental health professionals – which is still way below the actual requirements, in rural areas there are just none to be found. This is why some startups are trying to build platforms that can bring such professionals together, and allow people around the country to access their services. One such platform is InnerHour.

By providing counselling and therapy online that is easily accessible anytime and anywhere, Innerhour is trying bridge a gap that has been prevalent for way too long. The Innerhour team comprises of in-house therapists and and healthcare professionals who cater to more than 6,000 users – of which about 1,000 are paying clients, while the rest use their free tier services. Users on the platform can choose a therapist based on factors like language (7 local languages supported) and years of experience of the therapist, after which their therapy can be conducted over chat, call or even video calls. They also plan to tie up with healthcare providers, schools and corporates to reach a larger number of people both online and offline.

YourDOST started off as a mental health blog when Richa Singh was deeply affected by the suicide of a hostel mate, who was worried the she wouldn't get a job in the upcoming campus placements. After seeing the quick growth and popularity of the platform Richa and her partner Puneet

The InnerHour mobile app

Your DOST

YourDOST started off as a blog