JJ Abrams working on a new TV show set in space

It looks like JJ Abrams can't get enough of creating movies and TV shows based on outer space. So much so, that even though he's busy with several other ongoing projects, the visionary director wants to get his hands on some more. JJ is already working on Star Wars: Episode IX as the newly appointed director. He is also the producer to the upcoming Cloverfield 3 movie, and TV shows including Westworld, 11.22.63, and Castle Rock. The new untitled drama project revolves around a family with a scientist mother, father and daughter. After a car crash, the mother falls into a coma. The daughter comes across her mother's experiments taking forward the plot of the show.

Already having displayed his expertise with the sci-fi genre, any news of him being involved in any such project automatically grabs attention. For this project, Apple, HBO and Warner Brothers Television are reportedly interested to get on board.
