

LePad coming in mid-2011

Lenovo's tablet-cum-netbook device called LePad will most likely ship in June or July this year

Fuji Finepix J40 launched

Fujifilm India launched the Finepix J40, an affordable 12MP camera that's just 20mm thick

d Thank you for sharing your experience with us. Though we're pretty much in agreement with you, we feel the situation with vendor-based market places too is improving slightly with every passing year. The only way this problem will ever completely go away, is possibly when user-maintained reporting and reviewing systems become better. Also, users should take the effort to give negative rep to the vendor concerned.

CORRIGENDUM

In the Bazaar section (Page 65) the website for Samsung Wave 525 should be read as www.samsung.com/in/

In the Bazaar section (Jan 2011, Page 96) the price for Sparkle GTX 580 communicated to us at the time of printing was ₹31,000. The correct price is ₹42,000 as was recently communicated.

✉ I am a regular reader of your magazine and am very interested in smartphones and the technology surrounding them. My area of interest are smartphones running on the Windows mobile OS. But unfortunately I could not find much content on this new OS in your February issue and its top apps. I know the Android and Symbian phones are quite popular, but you should also cover Windows Phone 7 OS.

K Shabeeb

d February issue was a smartphone special and we did touch up on some finer aspects smartphone operating systems. Windows Phone 7 based OSes have only recently started flooding the Indian market. As for older iterations of Windows Mobile, even the relatively recent versions viz. 6.1 and 6.5 are pretty much on their way out. Sorry, but we just felt there were no takers amongst our readers. Android and Symbian were more in demand. In any case we have reviewed the HTC HD7, a phone based on the Windows Phone 7 OS this month. We will surely cover the Phone 7 OS in the coming months, as we get to play with it.

LETTER OF THE MONTH

✉ I have been buying Digit since 1998. I used to choose between Digit and other magazines depending on who had the most hardware coverage. But lately I decided to go steady with Digit as you published the Zeitgeist, not once, but twice. That decision could not have been a mistake. This month, the article on the Venus Project made me sit up and forced me to send this message to you.

Zeitgeist Part 1 was okay. It seems to me that the powers that be, contacted the producers, twisted their arms, and forced them create a Part 2, the Zeitgeist Addendum. If the 9/11 attacks were part of a plan for a global government (or dictatorship), then the bogus resource-based economy model also calls for a global government.

There has to be somebody who will implement this model on all humanity. If all resources belong to everyone, then how is it different from Communism, which was like Fascism, a movement funded by Wall Street globalists? The makers of Zeitgeist have been co-opted. They are compromised. They are not the same fearless bunch they were when they created Part 1.

Your writer did the correct thing by asking a JNU professor and bringing some balance into the article. The article did seem out of place in a tech publication but I wouldn't question your right to publish it. If you are in the market for advocacy, I recommend putting the No Agenda Show podcasts by tech columnist John C Dvorak and former MTV VJ Adam Curry. Although, I have some doubts about them too, it was from their podcasts that I learned that a lot of our vaccines today have mercury and that the WHO was also trying to use Aluminium if mercury was banned as a preservative.

d I don't necessarily agree completely with everything that all the activists have to say, or even with all the ideas that people have, but I do think it's important to expose Digit's rather large readership to new ideas, and get people thinking. In India, we often suffer from the "I'm just one person, what can I accomplish?" syndrome, which needs to end.

If there's one thing we should take from the West, it's that sense of righteousness that every normal citizen exhibits. That's the only reason why I featured any of those - Zeitgeist, Venus project, and The Yes Men. I'll look into whether we can arrange for the No Agenda Show podcasts to be included on the DVD. Also you'll be delighted to find John C. Dvorak's articles in the World View section and Zeitgeist 3 on the DVD.

If I can get even 100 readers to start thinking about subjects like these with the clarity of thought that you already display, I'll consider my attempts to be successful.

✉ I am an avid reader of your magazine. I have been reading Digit for about two years. I must say that I truly enjoy in reading your magazine. But the contents that you give in your DVDs are not as impressive. You should provide some good full-length games rather than just demos of the games. I have no complaints about the tools you give, but there should be more trailers of up-coming games and unboxing videos. Rest all is fine. Keep up the good work!

d Thank you for writing to us with your valuable feedback. Although, we try to give trailers of the latest games on our DVDs, it's not always possible to accommodate full games of the latest titles as they are copyright protected. Besides, reader preferences keep varying and we try to cater to the needs of as many readers as we can. We will certainly try our best to fulfil your expectations from us in the future issues of Digit. Keep writing in to us.
