

from those friends will show up in your timeline. This way, you don't waste time looking at stuff you don't really want to see.

Another way to connect with people is by joining pages with common interests. Say you like the Author Ayn Rand, or a particular artist, find their Facebook page and go to discussions within that page. In addition to this Facebook has started "Groups" some time back. These are closed 'invitation only' groups in which people can interact, share photos, documents and chat with each other. So you can create/join a group called "Geeks in India" and have fun. Back in the days when Orkut reigned supreme, people created 'communities' for even their college class or entire engineering batch etc. The same can now be done here.

But what about privacy? Being accessible goes against the grain of a few social networks, most notably Facebook. And the reason you need privacy is pretty simple. Say you're a developer, who is also a science fiction fan. You've joined relevant groups in line with your interests all over the place. You've probably had meaningful conversations / discussions with your contemporaries and they wish to "add you" to keep in touch - in a professional context. You wouldn't want these people (whom you know in a certain context) to be able to see your entire profile which includes that embarrassing picture you were tagged in when you were giving your inebriated rendition of Axl Rose's stage antics? This is where the privacy settings come into the picture - keeping your social circles separated.

Using privacy settings you can share only as much information as you want, with those people you want to. This is very important in keeping your profile clean to anyone from prospective recruiters to colleagues.

Head to the 'Account' dropdown button at the top right corner and click on privacy settings. This is your dashboard for controlling content. Everyone, Friends of Friends, Friends Only, are your default options. Better yet is to slot people as you add them into lists such as Colleagues, Random People, Formal Contacts, etc. When you click on customise settings you can specify what you share with whom. For example if you do not want to share your posts with a group of people called "Work", just click on the drop down for that content and click 'Custom'. Here you can add the "Work" list under Hide this from. Similarly you should hide particular albums from being viewable to certain lists. It's a little painful to begin with, but once it's all set up and all your connections are sorted, it will give you the power to control your appearance to the world in general - and that's perhaps the first step you need to take towards becoming a social network star.

A good cause

A few months ago, Paromita Deb Areng, who is an HR professional and a Sunday photographer, wanted to do something different for her 30th birthday. She knew she didn't want a holiday lounging on the beaches of Goa, nor the cool mountains of the Kumaon. She wanted to make a difference, wanted to make it even more memorable by bringing a bit of joy to some unfortunate orphan's life. In the month long run up to her birthday, she thought of an initiative, the goal of which was to raise ₹30,000 in a span of that month by selling her photographs for charity. To achieve this goal she leveraged the power of social networking. Posting on friend's walls, RTs, reasonable pricing and of course the thoughtful nature of the initiative all helped her reach her target.

"I had around 1000+ followers on Twitter (@sudentwilight) plus an equal number of contacts on Facebook, my fanpage and yes also my alumni network. I had launched a web site for the same and the orders just started pouring in - with maximum sales happening on Twitter and the rest from Facebook, I managed to collect ₹50,000 for the charity in a month."
