there to our local computer shopwales, the notion of software being free had been embedded in our minds (cheap antvirus being the only exception).
now i see people spending 25k - 30k on the latest nokia, lg etc. phone and refusing to pay even 50 bucks for an app useful to them. They are willing to waste 500 bucks on a pizza but not 50 on an app and the worst part is the sense of achievement that people feel on doing this - Perfect example was one of my friends who quickly rooted his new optimus and downloaded several pirated APK's - deployed them and was so happy about it, there is absolutely no sense of regret, they simply don't understand that if they pay they'll get better software later, it will help in development. The kind of adrenaline rush that Indians get out of free stuff is hilarious.

So why is it so?
is it because apps/software are not physical that indians don't want to pay for them?
Most Indians don't consider pirating apps as stealing?
or because of the hypocritical and selfish nature of us indians?

What do you'll think?

Its good that in India we don't get hardware at subsidised rates/free with contract, or number of defaulter will be quite high

This. Exactly.
Now only to figure out how to pirate free pizzas. Don't worry I'll buy one if I like it :)

when you pay for groceries, electricity, water ... why not pay for apps as well?
when you pirate a movie or a song, there is no stress on the resources of the publisher when a game gets pirated, the studio still has to allocate resources for the increased server load, and there is also the cost of giving support to all the pirated copies good news is that the publishers are meeting us half way, even games you play alone on your system needs to connect to a server
Steam is a good example of this, if playing really gets convenient, and support and updates are un-intrusive, you can expect that platform to flourish
