

Vine to be launched by Twitter

Twitter will soon launch Vine, the social video app allowing its users to share video clips on the network and other sites. <http://dgit.in/W5z5RA>

Sony penalised in UK

The PlayStation Network breakdown and databreach of 2011 has landed Sony a hefty fine of $395,000. This databreach leaked PSN users information online

How we unwind

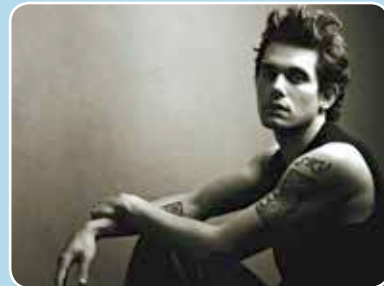

In Guns we trust

The day Anirudh brought his air gun to the office was the start of a reign of terror and destruction. The look of shock on the venerable Baiju's face as he faced Sid down the barrel of the gun was something to behold. Nothing was left alone, a battered penguin, punctured bottles, damaged plaster and the shattered remnants of Vijay's "twister" are all that remain of those fateful days.

Hibernation

The long cold nights have started to take their toll on us in the office. All we ever seem to want to do is huddle up under something warm and not get up till the return of warmer weather. Anirudh dreams of sunning himself like a cat while Jayesh just wants to hibernate. Sid of course has his own internal "fires" that keep him going long after everyone is asleep.

Mayer Mania

We suddenly re-discovered John Mayer and found out what an amazingly talented artist he is (Sid even went on to tell one of our Directors that Mayer's "the Eric Clapton of our generation". The cheek of him!). We also observed that Mayer sounds better when he performs live than all his studio renditions. Very few artists can claim to do that.

digit DIARY

This is going to be a hasty entry. This writer has some very important business to attend to. The reputation of the team is at stake. Take a deep breath, breath out, breath in, hold. Last month's intern, Siddhant, has really blossomed this month and after spending hours and hours and many a day testing cabinets, he surreptitiously played and polished his Quake skills and is now giving both Siddharth and yours truly a real run for their money, both of whom are frantically trying their best to hold on to the last shreds of their self-respect and ego as rocket after rocket from that indescribably tall minion blows up their virtual avatars into teensy-weensy little pieces at every opportunity they get. It is only the conditioning of years of Quaking that is keeping them in the lead so far. Every minute that we stay away from Quake is a minute that Siddhant spends improving his skill and this writer is getting left behind. Yaaargh! You pesky readers and your penchant for the diary.

(Five minutes later)

Ah. Packed off Siddhant for the night and now it's time to relax a bit. Whew! What a game! Let's see, what else happened this month? Ah yes, the gun. Anirudh's airgun brought a breath of life to the long nights of issue closing (and an excuse to not play Quake with Siddhant) and it also managed to kindle the primal instincts in most of us (the exception being Nimish, who considers himself above such barbaric behaviour). As you would have understood from the box above, there was many an inanimate casualty but the tale of the penguin is the saddest of them all.

The portly penguin has been part of our office for many a year and it was the kind-hearted Nimish who rescued it from the ignominy of the "box". They've spent many a night together, corralled in some corner, the penguin serenading Nimish with tinny tunes from its tiny speaker; ah the joys of the innocent. Anyway, Siddharth and Anirudh, while perusing through the office stash for odds and ends to shoot, found the penguin and decided that it was the perfect target. The poor penguin couldn't even wince as shot after merciless shot was pumped into it by the whole team, Robert included, shattering it from the inside and out. The remains of the poor creature were left where they fell and the poor Nimish was completely oblivious to the fate of his dear friend. When he found the remains the next day, adorning his desk, he was all man. He carefully collected all the pieces with a stony face and deposited them in the bin. Don't be fooled by his heartless demeanour though, we glimpsed a stray tear slipping down his gaunt cheek (the left one).