

Mobile Phones - International

These are brands that are available globally... the big guys! Last year was the year Samsung broke the dominance Nokia had in this category, beating it for the first time by a tiny margin. This year, however, the gap widened significantly, firmly seating Samsung on the mobile phone throne of India. To be honest, this was as we expected, given the way Android has shot to stardom in India.

HTC remained in fifth again, but third and fourth place swapped positions – Sony edged out Apple to claim third. BlackBerry (not RIM anymore) remained in sixth, but has lost a lot of ground in your eyes. Perhaps the new OS 10 and new models will help change that next year. LG, also, is catching up to them now, and Motorola seems on its way out of the Indian mobile

Interesting Facts

- 6% of people own an iPhone, but 20% say Apple is the first name in mobiles
- 72% of people didn't know Sansui cell phones
- 40% of people are exposed to BlackBerry because they or their friends own one (highest in this category)
- 77% people "Strongly Agree" that Apple makes "stylish products" Nokia offers the best after sales and consumer services (64%) and has the most service centres (79.6%)
- 70.5% people "Strongly Agree" that they're likely to buy other products from Samsung users minds – come on Google, do something about that! Although last year nearly half of all people surveyed owned a Nokia, this year it was about 30 per cent to both Samsung and Nokia, with Samsung edging out Nokia by 0.2 per cent. When it came to aided recall, where we suggest the brand names, and ask people if they were aware of said brands making products in this category, Sansui did the worst, with over 70 per cent of people saying they didn't know the company makes phones.

One question we asked, which did not count towards the scoring at all, was how people are exposed to products from these brands. Samsung and Nokia led here, with over 60 per cent of people being exposed to the brands by advertising, seeing them in stores, reading reviews, and also owning them. As expected after the aided recall figures, Sansui did the worst here (over 75 per cent of people claiming they aren't exposed to its products at all), but surprisingly, so did Alcatel and ZTE, with more than half of the respondents saying the same about them. Both Nokia and Samsung got the thumbs up for sales people being able to provide enough information about their products. This is important because when you go to a store, it's important to be able to ask questions and get answers to help you make your buying decisions.

Most people had no opinion on this subject for brands such as Sansui, Acer, Alcatel, Huawei and ZTE. However Motorola got the most negative votes here, with over 32 per cent of people saying they were dissatisfied with the knowledge of store attendants.

Motorola also did really badly in the question about whether you would purchase a phone in the future from them. Over 45 per cent of people said there was no chance of them buying a Motorola in the immediate future.
