

Tablet brands

Although tablets are nothing new, this is a new category for the Icons of Trust. This is because we wanted to give you some time to experience tablets, live with them a little before we took your opinion into consideration. Only when you're exposed to a product category for long enough, and have user experience – which includes not just the positives, but also the negatives – can you truly trust or distrust a brand.

As expected, the first brand people think of when they think tablets is Apple. The iPad started the trend obviously, so it's really no surprise that 45% people think Apple. However, Samsung is Interesting Facts

- 45% people think Apple, but only 21% actually own one
- 53.6% people think Apple, and a whopping 82% people think Samsung is easily available
- 89% of people wouldn't hesitate buying other products from Samsung
- 94% of people think the iPad is stylish not really that far behind with 42% people thinking Samsung first. Interestingly, the amount of people who own a Samsung tablet is almost double that of the amount who own an Apple – (39% and 21% respectively).

Apple beat Samsung in reliability and style, but lost out in terms of availability, knowledge of sales people and desire to purchase.

Sony, ASUS and Black-Berry completed the top five, with both Samsung and Apple way ahead of the three. Sony was a clear third place though, with no threat of anyone overtaking it. Micromax came sixth, and it was rather surprising to find Reliance and Karbonn all the way down in tenth and twelfth positions respectively. For the question we don't score, most people were exposed to products via advertising from Karbonn and Intex. In terms of reading reviews, most people have only read reviews of Amazon tablets, which makes sense because they're not readily available. As for all of the above (ads, stores, reviews and ownership) it was as expected: Apple and Samsung were the top brands there.
