Last year, our camera category was effectively a three-horse race between Canon, Sony and Nikon (they finished in that order. This year, it's pretty much the same, and though Canon won again, the margins are getting tighter. Nikon overtook Sony, just, to edge second place this year. Samsung and Panasonic completed the top five, but they were nowhere close to the big three in this category. The top of mind recall for this category was a tie between Nikon and Canon (both 35%), and a fraction more people owned a Nikon (24% to Canon's 23%), but most people owned a Sony camera (27%). Sony also beat both Canon and Nikon in a few more categories – more people found Sony products to be stylish and well designed, put more faith in Sony's after-sales service, and said there were more Sony service centres near them.

Where Canon and Nikon dominated all the other brands (including Sony) was in the desire to buy and also to recommend to others which cameras to buy. Also, people felt that Canons and Nikons were more reliable and superior in quality to Sony cameras. Overall, this is the closest category of all, and though Canon wins the title of "Most trusted camera brand for 2013", based on the rather narrow margins, it's fair to say that technology enthusiasts really do trust products from the top three brands in this category.

For the brand exposure question, as expected, most people weren't exposed to professional brands such as Hasselblad, but surprisingly, people also weren't exposed to Benq's and Sanyo's products.

More people see Kodak cameras only in stores than any other brand, and surprisingly, also mostly see Kodak in ads. When it comes to reviews, most people read more reviews about Leica cameras than anyone else.

As expected, when it comes to exposure from all facets
