This is one category that's been dominated by Apple. Expected too, since it's the iPod that made the biggest splash in the PMP market. That said, nothing lasts forever, and in the technology world, market dominances change eventually. This is exactly what's happened this year in the PMPs category. Sony has emerged as the most trusted PMP brand in 2013. After losing several years to Apple by considerable margins, finally Sony has beaten Apple by

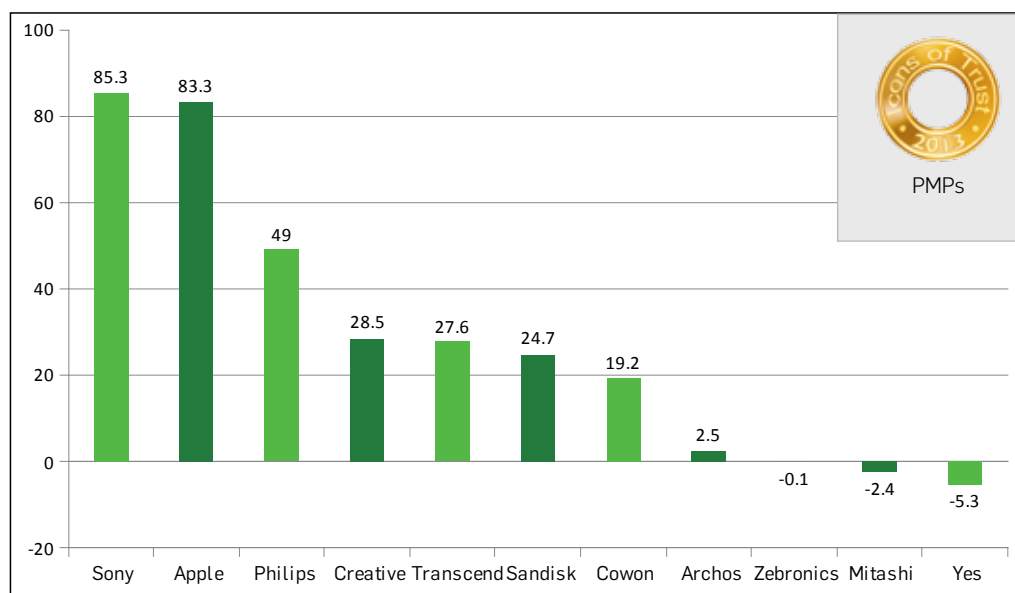

2 points this year. What's surprising is that although a whopping 64 per cent of people's first thought is Apple (iPod) when they are asked about PMPs, more people suggest Sony as a brand with unaided recall. It's not surprising, however, that 43 per cent of people own an Apple (as opposed to 32 per cent for Sony). Sony then goes on to pip Apple on points in terms of quality, reliability, after-sales, availability and desire to buy. It hammers Apple in terms of service centres available and also in terms of desire to buy a Sony product from other categories. The one place Apple wins hands down is product design and style. Overall this category was a close fight between the top two, with Philips coming a dis-
