Spring Is Here

Since we last met, some of the biggest players on web have made major changes to their biggest services. Others closed down services, news that was received with either indifference, or much outrage. Read on to get a low-down on the most important changes to the web

Facebook's Redesigned Timeline and News Feed

Facebook has announced it will be rolling out improvements to Timeline in a bid to make it easier for users to express what they find important to them. Users can now see their latest posts on the right side of the Timeline, while photos, music, and other activities on the left panel.

"We heard from you that the current timeline layout is sometimes hard to read. Starting today, all posts are on the right side of your timeline, with photos, music and other recent activity on the left," says Facebook about the new layout.

Users can now add other apps to share more things on the site. For an example, users can include Instagram photo stream as a section on their timeline.

Users can remove the app from their About page, using the Activity Log.

Facebook's new News Feed design is aimed at preventing user fatigue, and also attracting new advertisers to the network. The focus is on minimalism in design, and greater visibility for shared media – photos and videos. The new design is being rolled out for the desktop version, as well as the mobile version. The company wants a uniform look of the network, no matter what the device or the platform.

The News Feed, which provides a running list of updates from a user's network, will serve as a "personalized newspaper" for Facebook's 1 billion users, chief executive Mark Zuckerberg said. He mentioned that this is another step in the "evolving face" of the social network. He said that he wants Facebook to be "the best personalized newspaper in the world."

tagram, now has 100 million active users. Facebook, despite owning it, calls it a formidable competitor, in a testament to the network's popularity. "One of the services that is, I think, a quite formidable competitor is Instagram," David Ebersman, Facebook chief financial officer, told investors at the Morgan Stanley Technology, Media, & Telecom Conference. This is a huge testament to Instagram's own place in the social networking services business.

Google Reader Axed

Google in March announced through an official blog post that Reader, the popular RSS reader would be shut down on the first of July this year. Google said that the shutdown was part of the second round of its 'spring cleaning,' a process that was started back in 2011 to close down services in order for Google to 'focus' on its more popular services.

Google's announcement has led to a tremendous outcry on social network services, some of which, ironically, led to the falling popularity of the RSS reader. Some users have already started online petitions to force Google to change its mind while others have posted elegiac stories for the beloved RSS reader.

For a service as popular as Reader, Google has been unusually curt in explaining its reasoning behind the shutdown. Instead of announcing the decision in a separate blog-post, Google hid the Reader announcement right in the middle of its spring cleaning post where it announced the closure of seven other services as well.

In the post, Google's Urs Hölzle writes, "While the product has a loyal following, over the years usage has declined. So, on July 1, 2013, we will retire Google Reader." But there's no more information beyond that. While it's
