

Upgrade!

First of all, thanks to those of you who wrote in to us last month, with regards to our new initiative – dgt. It's certainly not easy to go out of our comfort zone and start a lifestyle supplement, but thanks to the overwhelming response, we now know we're on the right track.

I still think it's far from perfect, but like anything in technology, including this magazine, dgt is what we'd like to call a beta product. Only with regular feedback from you can we keep improving it, so make sure to write in and tell us if you want something covered, or want more of something.

Given the rather unusually large amount of email demanding that dgt be made a permanent fixture, much like the Fast Track, we've decided to up our workloads significantly and bite the bullet.

From this month onwards, dgt will be a regular feature, and we hope to make it grow in quality and thickness based on the letters we get from all of you.

Times are hard though. This magazine started with a price of ₹100, and still we've absorbed all costs to keep the increase to only a 50 per cent hike even after a decade. As I'm sure you've seen from the world around you, a mere 50 per cent hike in a decade is unthinkable.

You'd certainly quit a job if your salary wasn't at least triple or quadruple of what it was when you started working ten years ago...

Factor in the skyrocketing paper costs, distribution and miscellaneous costs and, well, it's expensive times!

It took a lot of deliberation, arguing and soul searching, but we decided that instead of raising the cost of the magazine to provide dgt, we would have to find a way to keep the price tag the same.

For years, we've offered 2 DVDs when no competing magazine could afford to, because we absorbed the costs by reducing profits. We continue to do exactly that, while making sure you don't miss out on any software goodness by making the DVD as power-packed as possible.

Of course the Fast Track will remain untouched, because we know better than to mess with it. A few years ago, we asked you whether you'd prefer an interactive version on the DVD instead of the booklet, and were inundated by angry email from many of you. If I remember correctly, we even got a few death threats (as jokes, I hope).

Also, special issues will be packed to the brim with goodies as usual, including extra DVDs and booklets, much like we did in our last issue.

I certainly hope this new upgrade to the Digit package content is more appealing and improved, and promise that Team Digit will strive to improve it even further.

We live off feedback though, and urge you to write in to us with suggestions – for articles, software, story ideas, technology topics and yes, even new initiatives such as dgt.

CORRIGENDUM

In our coverage of Icons of Trust 2013 last month, we made a few big blunders. In the External Storage category we completely missed out on an important brand, and couldn't carry the Laptops category because of data corruption. We ask all our readers to kindly ignore the results of the Icons of Trust – External Storage category, and please retake the two surveys at: www.thinkdigit.com/trust

Also, in the Internal Storage category, we wrote that Western Digital (WD) had bought over Hitachi's storage business in 2011. During editing, we omitted an update that mentioned that in 2012 Toshiba bought Hitachi's assets from WD.

Our sincere apologies for these errors to the readers as well as all the brands involved. We will republish the results soon.
