

A wide angle lens is especially useful when shooting in the great outdoors until just the right moment. In many cases the calm is so short you can't use the self-timer because the breeze may have resumed by the time it takes the picture

Close-ups versus Context

The way you compose an image depends partly on what your goals are. If your primary interest is taking photos that can be used by others to identify plants, your photos could be of the documentary type. If you are interested in being more impressionistic, there are no rules at all.

Playing the Angles

Shooting down is the normal angle but getting down at eye-level, or even shooting up is a unique view. If you want things sharp, try to have them all fall in the same plane and have the camera parallel to that plane.
