

2.1 What's inside?

The main components of your computer at a glance

The Computer Case

Computer cases (or cabinets) come in various shapes and sizes, and are differentiated into two broad categories depending on what power supply they have: ATX or AT. They are further divided into sub-types such as tower cases, mini-tower cases, or desktop cases. The latter are very good in terms of space saving, and mostly belong to the ATX power supply category.

Cases with the AT type of power supply resembled the mini-tower ATX cases of now, and had much lesser room. Also, about five to six years ago, AT power supplies were more prevalent in home computers than ATX power supplies, because the cost of the latter was considerably higher. Besides, if you opted for one, you